A local futon store went up in flames due to an unknown cause.

Wildcat Futons Plus, 607 N. 11th St., caught fire at 12:25 p.m. Tuesday.

Pete Heptig, Manhattan Fire Department Battalion chief, said the cause of the fire is unknown at this time and an investigation will take place over the next few days.

"The fire was fully involved when we arrived on the scene at around 12:25," Heptig said. "We have no indication as to what began the fire right now."

Heptig said no one was in the store when the fire started and there were no injuries resulting from it.

"The store owner was staffing the store at the time, but there were no customers in the store when the fire started," Heptig said.

Heptig said damages to Futons Plus are unknown at this time.

Lucky Mac's Liquor Store, 1100 Laramie St., and Mini Mart Convenience Grocery Store, 1102 Laramie St., both received some smoke damage. Smoke damage to Lucky Mac's is estimated to be about $2,000 and smoke damage to Mini Mart is estimated to be about $3,000.

Futons Plus owner Kevan Proctor said he had been in the store all morning and the fire began right as he stepped out of the building.

"The store had been open all morning when around noon my daughter and I went to the Mini Mart to refill my coffee," Proctor said. "When we came back, the store was on fire."

Proctor said what could have started the fire is a mystery to him.

"Ironically, the fire marshal had been here in the morning doing an inspection," Proctor said. "I had told him that I thought something smelled hot in the store when I opened it that morning, but the inspection showed that there were no problems."

McCain, Gore come out on top in 1st primary

■ Bradley vows to continue in race after falling behind Gore by 5 percent.

By RON FOURNIER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Arizona Sen. John McCain scored a landslide victory over George W. Bush on Tuesday in New Hampshire's leadoff primary, puncturing the aura of inevitability that had buoyed his Republican presidential campaign. Vice President Al Gore survived a toe-to-toe challenge from Democratic challenger Bill Bradley.

"We have sent a powerful message to Washington that change is coming," McCain told cheering supporters. He watched returns with his teary-eyed wife, Cindy, who put a trembling hand to her mouth and said, "It really happened."

McCain rolled up 49 percent of the GOP vote, Bush just 31, an 18-point margin that recast the GOP race for the larger states ahead.

Of necessity, Bush took the long view, telling The Associated Press, "New Hampshire has long been known as a bump in the road for front-runners, and this year will be no exception." After calling McCain with congratulations, Bush told supporters, "I am a better candidate for having come to New Hampshire and waging this campaign and because of this competition."

Gore was winning 52 percent of the Democratic vote, Bradley 47.

"We're going to march all the way down the field — from state to state, from coast to coast — all the way to victory in November," the vice president told supporters, as Democrats and Republicans alike looked to a five-week stretch of primaries that could determine the nominees by mid-March.

Bradley lost badly in Iowa last week and surrendered the lead he once had in New Hampshire polling, but Tuesday night he found solace in the narrower margin and he vowed to continue his challenge. "We're moving forward," Bradley told AP and indeed he has enough money to remain competitive in an expensive sprint of follow-up primaries, a luxury McCain could not have afforded.

AP's delegate analysis showed Gore leading for 13 out of the 22 Democratic delegates at stake in New Hampshire, with Bradley winning 9.

Nearly four out of every 10 New Hampshire voters do not declare a party affiliation, and these independents were a potent attraction to insurgent candidates McCain and Bradley in a state with a proud history of knocking front-runners offside.

McCain credited his agenda of political and campaign finance reform for his victory. "The Republican Party recovered its heritage of reform. And it's the beginning of the end of the truth-twisting politics of Bill Clinton and Al Gore," he said.

With returns from 86 percent of New Hampshire's 300 Republican precincts, McCain had 49 percent of the vote compared to 31 for Bush. Millionaire publisher Steve Forbes was a distant third at 13 percent and former Amb. Alan Keyes was at 6.

McCain was winning 10 out of the 17 GOP delegates at stake, Bush 5 and Forbes 2.

Social conservative Gary Bauer barely registered in the returns and was struggling to survive. "I'm a fighter but I'm not delusional," Bauer said, before flying home to Virginia to take stock of his candidacy.

Forbes had to be disappointed, too, finishing little better than he did in the 1996, after investing four years and millions of dollars for a second GOP bid. Yet Forbes said he would stay and fight for conservative voters who might be tempted to peel away from the suddenly vulnerable Bush.

"I make this appeal to those who may have backed others because of inevitability, I plead with you, please come home," he said.

"I will congratulate John McCain on his victory," Keyes said, "but I cannot agree with the stands he has portrayed on the issues in this election."

Aaron Ingalsbe studies at his desk in the living room of his house Tuesday afternoon. Aaron and his younger brother and sister are home-schooled by their parents, Nada and Kennan Ingalsbe.

Staying HOME for SCHOOL

Christian group helps families teach children outside of public system

They wake up at 6:30 every morning and meet as a family for Bible study.

Breakfast then is prepared while the father meets with one of his three children and listens to any concerns he or she might have.

After breakfast, everyone does household chores and meets in the living room for school.

Meet Keenan and Nada Ingalsbe. They decided to home-school their three children: Aaron, 18; Adam, 16; and Janette, 14.

"We were wanting to raise our kids with the scripture and include the Bible in all aspects of learning," Keenan Ingalsbe, a computer consultant, said. "And we knew the public schools wouldn't do that, so it wasn't an option."

Although both parents went to public schools, they decided their children would benefit from home schooling. They are members of a Christian home-school group that has around 60 participating families.

Opposite the blue living-room couch is a space sectioned off for studying. Books are open, and pens lie atop previously taken notes. The children take it upon themselves to meet the deadlines their parents impose. They study general subjects such as math and science but also pursue their interests.

Aaron, the oldest child, wants to become a lawyer. He has taken the ACT and talked to teachers who approved his courses and education.

Although he said learning has been much more productive in home schooling, he will continue his studies at K-State this fall.

"I'm actually looking forward to it. I'm pretty outgoing, so I don't see problems with that," Aaron said. "I look forward to the academic competition."

His younger brother, Adam, likes electrical work and has been looking at technical colleges or apprenticeships. He prefers the hands-on experience he has gained while being home-schooled. Behind their house is a bigger house that he and Aaron helped build. Their grandmother lives there.

"The best part of being home-schooled is that it's real flexible," Adam said.

Janette, the youngest Ingalsbe, said she still is unsure of what she wants to pursue as a career. She is taking a nutrition course, but she still has to study certain subjects.

Her mother said the subjects taught vary on the kids' interests, but there are rules.

"We evaluate whether that subject is going to be important in their life. If not, they should know it for general knowledge," Nada Ingalsbe said. "We expose them to it, but don't focus on it that much."

Although the Ingalsbes believe in the creation theory, they have taught their children about the evolution theory and make them aware of it.

Most responses to their teaching methods have been encouraging, Nada Ingalsbe said.

"Our family wasn't really excited about it at first," she said. "As we went along, they've seen the fruit of it, and they've been really supportive. It's the same way with our friends."

Keenan Ingalsbe said home-schooling is a lot easier and more accepted now because it's become

Four months is all that's left.

This, however, is where the similarities end.

Aubri Olson is 18 and a senior at Flint Hills Christian School. She has green eyes, brown hair and an athletic build. Katie Lane is 17 and a senior at Manhattan High School. She has bright red hair and is on the slender side.

Both have been at their respective schools since they enrolled.

"For me, I fit in really well at a private school," Olson said. "One reason I fit in there is the small group."

Olson's high school has 35 students, nine of which are in her graduating class. Lane, however, is graduating with about 500 other students.

"There's a lot of unity in my class," Lane said. "For one, we're the class of 2000. We've also had to deal with a lot of things as a class."

Both girls, however, said

Bacterial infection in womb results in 7 fetuses aborted

NEPTUNE, N.J. — Doctors ended the five-month pregnancy of a woman carrying septuplets, saying they needed to abort the fetuses to save the 31-year-old mother's life.

The seven fetuses were aborted Monday after it became clear a bacterial infection was endangering the life of Ivette Zapata-Small, her physician, Dr. Charles Hux, said Tuesday.

Doctors had planned to deliver the fetuses in late March, when they would have been 28 or 29 weeks old.

Zapata-Small is expected to make a full recovery and likely will be released from a hospital later this week, Hux said.

The abortion initially was reported by the Asbury Park Press.

Zapata-Small and her husband, Fred Small, 37, of Lakewood, N.J., announced the pregnancy last week.

She had become pregnant after taking the fertility drug Pergonal. Such drugs frequently are associated with multiple pregnancies.

Zapata-Small was carrying three girls and two boys, doctors said. The sex of the remaining two fetuses had not been determined.

Hux told the newspaper a bacteria from the mother's bloodstream had invaded her womb, and the fetuses also had been infected.

Fetuses in the womb do not respond to antibiotics, he said. By Monday, it had become clear that the infected fetuses were endangering Zapata-Small's life, Hux said.

Hux said last week he had recommended that Zapata-Small abort four or five of the fetuses to enhance her chances of carrying the remaining ones to full term.

The couple refused, citing their religious beliefs.

Smashing Pumpkins arrive in Lawrence, chat with fans

The band greeted more than 200 people camped out at a Lawrence record store Monday before giving a concert, promoting their forthcoming album "Machina/the machines of God."

Some of the diehard fans spent the night before shivering in the cold, waiting for the band to arrive.

Karin Stone, who drove six hours from her home in Bettendorf, Iowa, to meet the group, said she was lucky to get inside the store.

She gave the group roses, and all four members signed her poster.

"I kissed (lead singer) Billy Corgan," Stone said. "He kept saying, 'Thanks.'"

Computer firm nets 2nd fine for election contributions

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A Miami computer company already fined $1 million by the Justice Department for illegally contributing to Democratic candidates has agreed to pay another $209,000 to the Federal Election Commission.

Future Tech International used corporate funds to reimburse employees who contributed to President Clinton's 1996 campaign and several House and Senate Democrats, including Sens. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Robert Torricelli of New Jersey, according to documents released by the FEC.

In addition, Future Tech made $110,000 in unregulated soft-money contributions to the Democratic National Committee. As a citizen of the Philippines, Future Tech president Mark Jimenez legally could not contribute to American political campaigns.

Jimenez built the distributor of computer components and peripherals from a small company to one that does more than $250 million a year in business.

He since has returned to his home country.

In December, as part of the Justice Department investigation into campaign finance violations, the company and its chief financial officer, Juan C. Ortiz, signed plea agreements and were fined $1 million.

According to court documents, Future Tech reimbursed about 23 employees for campaign contributions to the 1996 Clinton-Gore Primary Committee in connection with a Sept. 19, 1995, fund-raising event at the Sheraton Bal Harbour Hotel in Miami.

Super TV A super week put ABC ahead of its rivals for bragging rights as the season's most-watched television network.

ABC crushed its competition last week behind Sunday's competitive Super Bowl game between the St. Louis Rams and Tennessee Titans and another record-setting performance by

"Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?"

Sunday's ABC Super Bowl telecast was up 7 percent in ratings over the 1999 game, according to Nielsen Media Research.

ABC had worried that a game featuring two relatively small media markets would show ratings weakness.

After the Super Bowl, the three most-watched programs of the week were all showings of "Millionaire." The game show's Tuesday audience of 35.3 million was its largest yet.

With the Academy Awards ahead on ABC and "Millionaire" showing no signs of weakening, ABC is on target for its first ratings season championship since 1994-95.

"I really think it will be pretty difficult ... for another network to make up that deficit," Larry Hyams, chief researcher for ABC, said.

Black History Month kicks-off with Jeopardy

BY CHRISTIE VANOVER AND JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An entire month dedicated to important events in black history began with a game of African-American Jeopardy on Tuesday night in the K-State Student Union's Union Station.

However, if the questions were too difficult for those in attendance, February offers a list of events that will allow them to learn more about the subject.

Tuesday's game served as the kick-off rally for Black History Month, 29 days of activities that honor accomplishments and contributions of the black community.

"It's a fun way to introduce African-American history to folks," said Korri Hall, senior in secondary education and Black Student Union president.

Mimi Davison, relations chairwoman for BSU and junior in public relations and advertising, said the significance of events in black history shouldn't be important for just the members of BSU.

"It's important to know these things," Davison said. "This isn't just our history — it's America's history."

Hall said Black History Month can be attributed to Carter Woodson, who organized Negro History Week in 1926 to educate people and celebrate black history and achievement. Nearly 50 years later, the week expanded into Black History Month.

"Everyone's culture is different. It helps to experience them all," Hall said.

The month of events will continue with tonight's featured speaker, T. Leon Williams, Northern Ohio University's director of multiculturalism. Williams will present his lecture on promoting multiculturalism in residence halls at 7 in Hale Library's Hemisphere Room.

However, Hall said the month's most eagerly awaited guest is its keynote speaker, Sister Souljah, who will speak at 7 p.m. Thursday in the Union Courtyard. The former rapper, now a political commentator and motivational speaker, was one of the driving forces behind the Million Woman March, Hall said.

"Sister Souljah spoke to over 1 million women in Philadelphia, and now she's coming to Manhattan,"

Hall said. "That's a big accomplishment for KSU."

Friday will be a day of hip-hop, complete with a free-style competition in the afternoon in the Union Courtyard. At 7 p.m. that evening in Union Station, hip-hop artists from Kansas and Missouri will perform during a BSU-sponsored concert.

The first week of Black History Month will conclude at 3 p.m. Saturday with a hip-hop fashion show that will display the styles and fashions that have evolved through the 25 years of hip-hop.

The night's attire will be exemplified by participants such as the night's emcee, LaTrice Moore.

"People should come to see the different styles and phases of hip-hop and how it has affected everyone," said Moore, junior in apparel and textile marketing.

Granville Freeman, educational co-chairman for BSU and junior in public relations, said the importance of Black History Month should extend to students beyond the organization.

"It's important to know another history than your own. It gives you a better outlook on what goes on in life

City Commission approves animal-shelter funds

■ Depot, housing board other items of business.

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A bigger and better animal shelter is one step closer after the Manhattan City Commission unanimously voted to approve funding Tuesday night.

The unanimous vote to award a $585,700 contract to Sunflower Builders came after Mayor Roger Reitz thanked individuals who made the project happen.

The T. Russel Reitz Regional Animal Shelter, named for Reitz's father, was too small from the day it opened in 1988, he said. Despite constant euthanization to provide space for new arrivals, estimates in recent years put renovation costs near $1 million and blocked renovation efforts, he said.

However, the proposed building will increase the current floor space of 4,495 square feet to 6,700 square feet and add a quarantine area, plus a night drop-off area, all of which might cost less than $600,000 in the end. Interim City Manager Ron Fehr said the shelter should take about 180 days to complete.

Although a fund-raising committee raised nearly $50,000 toward the project, the majority of the renovation and expansion likely will be funded through general obligations bonds, which the city also approved that night.

Commissioner Karen McCulloh said additional contributions will go towards an endowment fund for ongoing support of the shelter.

The commission also voted 5-0 to begin the second phase of the Union Pacific Depot renovation with a contract for $31,950 to Bruce McMillan, AIA, Architects.

The station on the east side of the city, best known as the site of Theodore Roosevelt's 1903 visit to Manhattan, has been unused since 1971. The first phase of the restoration, which occurred last October under McMillan, worked to stabilize the structure of the building.

Dixie West, member of the depot committee, said a Heritage Trust Fund Grant helped the city fund the first phase and an Intermodal Service Transportation Efficiency Act Grant will assist the second, but the grant does not cover McMillan's design costs of nearly $30,000.

At the unanimous approval of the commission, city staff was allowed Tuesday night to apply for a second Heritage Trust Fund Grant, which has a maximum of $75,000. In addition, the Manhattan/Riley County Preservation Alliance has agreed to pay $7,500, half of the city's share if the grant is given.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said he was concerned about what the depot will become after renovation.

"I'm unsettled we don't have a better feel for the proposed uses," he said.

The list of ideas includes everything from a barbecue restaurant to a way station for travelers on the Linear Park Trail to art gallery space to a railroad museum.

McCulloh said she thinks the second phase, work on the visible outer shell, will bring more interest and support when people can see the improvements.

In other business, the commission voted down a proposal that would require a Manhattan mayor to ensure two of his or her appointees to the five-member Manhattan Housing Authority are recipients of the public housing program.

The resolution that did pass requires that at least one of the mayor's appointees be a recipient, but does not limit how many more can be appointed by choice.

The commission also unanimously approved a resolution authorizing city staff to issue up to $283,877 in general obligation bonds for infrastructure improvements across the city.

Regents receive Senate approval

By JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Members of the state Board of Regents easily won Senate confirmation Tuesday, despite recent tuition increases and allegations of discrimination against female employees.

The Senate voted 40-0 to approve Gov. Bill Graves' nine appointments to the board, which oversees the operations of state universities, community colleges and technical colleges.

The vote was unanimous even though Democrats have been vocal in raising questions about the regents' operations. The regents spent two hours answering questions during a meeting Friday of the Senate Education Committee.

The Senate's Republican leaders had postponed the confirmation votes and scheduled the Education Committee's hearing so Democrats could express their concerns.

"Going through that exercise was in no way intended to block those appointments," said Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka.

Regents Chairman Bill Docking said he was pleased with the Senate's vote and said Friday's hearing was productive.

"I thought it was candid, and I thought it was useful to the regents," Docking said in an interview.

Sen. Sandy Praeger, R-Lawrence, said the regents' participation in the hearing alleviated some senators' concerns.

Graves appointed all nine regents after the state reorganized its higher education system last year, to give the board control over community colleges and technical schools.

His appointees include two former legislators, prominent business executives and Docking, a banker and son of the late Gov. Robert Docking.

"I actually think we've got a really strong group of regents right now," Praeger said.

Transfer students deserve to receive help

Transfer students get no respect. They arrive at K-State from community colleges or universities around the country, only to be told they are at a disadvantage compared to those who started at K-State. After completing lower-level classes at a previous school, the students will start at K-State with no grade point average and more difficult classes. They will have to adjust to a new school, usually much bigger than the one they previously attended.

Finally, they often discover that many of the classes they took at their previous school will not count toward their K-State graduation. Despite coming to K-State with such disadvantages, transfer students have found ways to flourish. Mike Lynch, associate vice president for educational and personal advancement, said a higher percentage of students who transfer to K-State graduate in comparison with those who enter as freshmen. In fact, Lynch said, about half of students who graduate from K-State are transfer students. Yet only 1,500 to 2,000 students transfer to K-State annually, in contrast to the 3,500 who enter as freshman. Despite such high comparative graduation rates, transfer students receive little help in getting ready for their K-State careers. The answer to this lies in communication. "It's very much a three-way deal," Lynch said. "Everybody needs to be in communication with everybody else." Although there is an online listing of the classes that will transfer to K-State, this list changes constantly, and students might not be aware. Students should protect themselves by checking www.ksu.edu/admit/transfer.html to be sure their classes will transfer. But because the list is not static, students cannot shoulder all the responsibility.

K-State and state community colleges need to be in constant contact with one another to assure students they will be getting a fair shake when they move on to K-State. Transfer students are a vital part of K-State and should be given more attention to assure they will continue to want to attend K-State.

► OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

The Collegian's Reader Forum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

Dot-com nerds need to stick to their Web pages and away from Super Bowl commercials.

The ad that Elements of Taste had in Friday's Collegian obviously shows that they have no taste, so I won't ever be eating there.

I think that the Collegian's editorial on how Greek Affairs needs to admit their mistakes and change the system is only trying to stir up things between the independents and the Greeks. Come on, Collegian, get a life.

This is a message for the guy that I saw urinating on a tree outside of Boyd Hall Monday morning at 10:30 a.m. You're disgusting. Show some respect for the campus and the students that share it with you.

Jeff Elliott should quit his whining. We've been paying $6.50 for movies in Salina for three years.

This message is for Katie Sutton. Since you're in journalism and all, I think you should look up the word sensationalism.

This message is for Joe Leonard. We love you. We've always loved you. Now go out there and show us that you care.

Why do students insist on packing up to leave five minutes before the class is over? The shuffling of jackets and snapping of binders makes it impossible to concentrate, and it is beyond rude.

I'm tired of my student fees paying for a weekly dose of religious b.s.

Scott Roney, it's time to diversify your journalism and stop beating the Bible.

If we raise the permit prices instead of the fees, we can punish the faculty along with the students.

Wefald, why don't you donate that 10.9-percent raise to basketball recruiting so we can actually have some decent athletes.

I'm so tired of classes already. Where's one of those Kelly Glasscock sunset pictures when you need one?

Be brave and say, "Yes, hazing goes on?" Yeah, right. Then that's all we'd read about on the front page of the Collegian for a week.

Man, what I wouldn't do for an ice-cold Coca-Cola.

I'm sure K-Rock is going to get a lot more listeners now that they've fired their best three DJs.

The only people at K-State who should be allowed to smoke are those who are set on fire.

I think we should have a scrimmage between the K-State men's and women's basketball teams. That way, one of them can end their losing streak.

Hey, all you Greek bashers. When you mess with Barb Robel, you mess with the whole family.

We want Lon Kruger back.

Is anybody else sick of not being able to get on the K-State server?

I just wanted to say I am so embarrassed Scott Roney is from my town.

Why is it that the Campus Fourum often doesn't print things if they are of the positive nature? The Collegian would better itself if it would drop the Fourum altogether.

the anti-HOLIDAY

Under-marketed, under-celebrated Groundhog Day to be commended

For years, I used to scratch my head and wonder, "Where will I be and what will I be doing on Groundhog Day 2000?" As far as significant dates go, maybe it pales next to New Year's, but, hey, aside from Easter, where else are you gonna go for smelly furry animals umbilically tied to holidays?

I've always really appreciated Groundhog Day. Why? It's like the ultimate anti-holiday. There's no 5 a.m. "Groundhog Day Shopping Spree" mad rush through MonolithMart. There are no Groundhog Day greeting cards (are there?). It's all gloriously under-marketed and under-celebrated (considering the only way to celebrate the day properly is to start yankin' sleepy critters out of their holes, and doing too much of that will get you in trouble, no matter what the calendar says). Plus, it's a day devoid of any real "significance," in the heavy sense. It's so frivolous, nonsensical and meaningless that it's worth making a big deal about.

At the same time, though, I've always been curious. Where did the logic derive from? Who thought up the great idea to somehow give long-range forecasting abilities to this pile of fur that hugs itself out of a burrow? What bearing does the shadow-casting ability of these squirrels-with-thyroid-problems have on extended meteorological trends?

Good question. I've asked it — several times, in fact. I can't count the blank stares I got. Responses were understandable, from "Why are you asking me?" to "Don't you have anything else better to do than fret over the sleeping habits of ground-dwelling varmints?" Well, no, not really. And it's not really fretting; sometimes, I just wanna know.

Well, there's always the Internet. In my mind's eye, I'd always pictured Groundhog Day as something that a bunch of bored Pennsylvanians threw together as a tourist attraction or as a little piece of psychic Prozac in an otherwise mundane and rote midwinter existence. Imagine my disappointment when I found that — like so many other holidays — it has its origins in religion, just like your typical holiday. Fooy. Where's the fun in that?

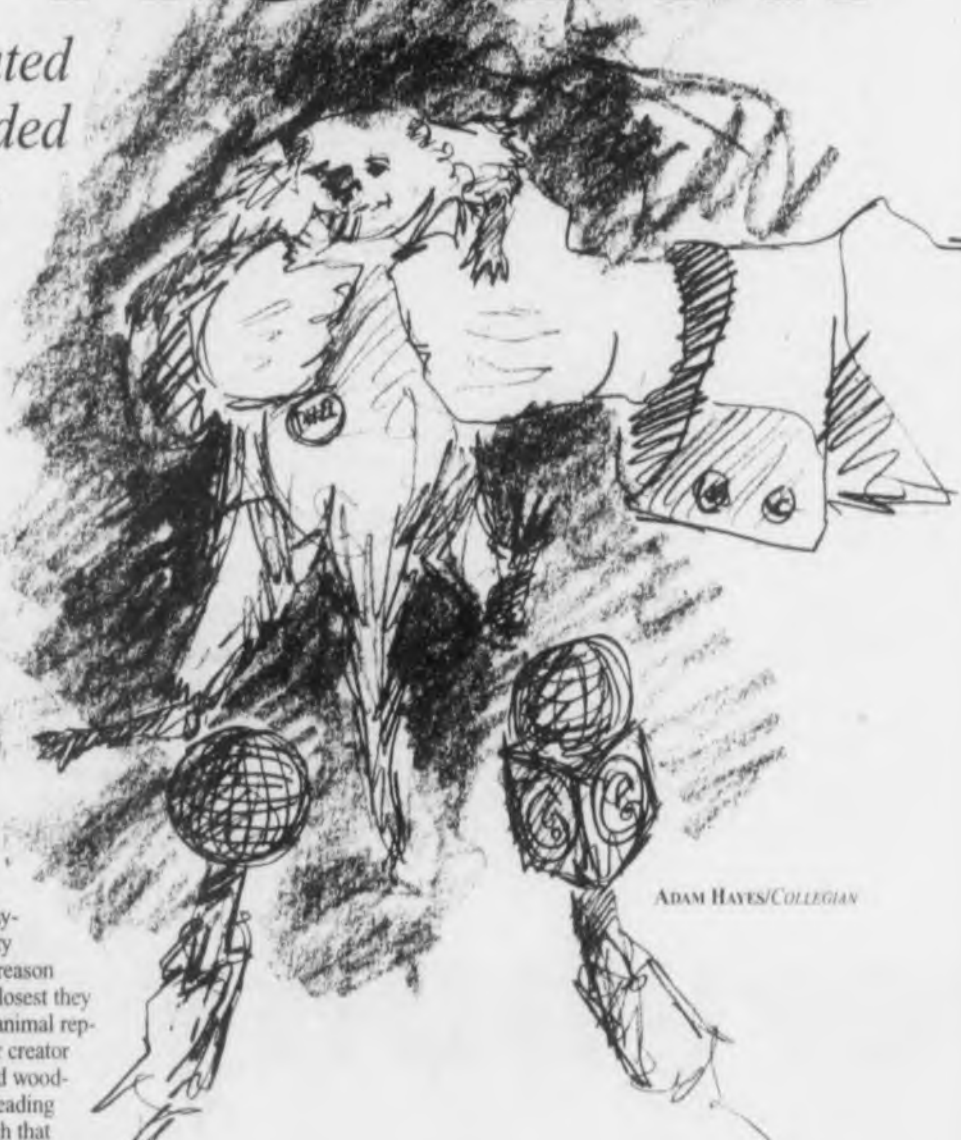

Maybe you already know this (and if you did, where were you when I was asking people?), but if not, well, I pride myself on providing a public service. Turns out there was a midwinter celebration, a midway-marker, something to celebrate survival to that point and anticipate the renewal of spring. (Imagine February weather here. Now imagine it in Ireland, where rain falls in tubs, ice falls in sheets and cattle drop from the sky in herds without any explanation. Our weather is odd; theirs is just plain depressing. They had to celebrate any glimmer of hope they could eke out.) So this celebration falls, on our calendar, 'round Feb. 2.

Today. The middle of the season of winter, or in the ballpark.

So we've got a midwinter celebration, called Groundhog Day or Imbolc or Candlemas or whatever. Why the groundhog? The more pagan-leaning Web site I found explained it thusly, and I quote: "The Groundhog is a manifestation of the God." That's it. No other explanation. You want to pity the people who came up with this holiday-slash-tradition? Pity them for no other reason than because the closest they could come to an animal representation of their creator was an overinflated woodchuck. (If I were reading this aloud, I'd finish that sentence screaming at the top of my lungs. I'd use ALL CAPS, but the copy editors beat me when I do that. ... Ow!)

OK. The shadow? One of those old traditional tales, like "ring around moon, rainy afternoon" or ... no, that's not it. I can never remember those, but they're little tidbits of rhyme integrated into folklore and based around curious atmospheric phenomena that are occasionally accurate indications of progressing climatic patterns. Or, less pompously, little bitta rhythm, little bitta truth. Anyhow, the particular nugget of wisdom for this holiday goes something like this:

"If Candlemas be fair and bright,
Come, winter, have another flight;
If Candlemas brings clouds and rain,
Go winter, and come not again."
Putting it this way is like reducing it out of absurdity in that it removes the critters' shadow-casting altogether. But it gets almost Zen: A groundhog cannot cast a shadow without a sun, after all. So you can't have a proper Groundhog Day without a groundhog, and well, here we are. Where's your groundhog? I think (and maybe my critter-census is out of date) we're fresh out. But we've got plenty of squirrels.

Maybe, if Punxsutawney (and you can bet I didn't type that name from memory) can have its groundhogs, maybe we can have our own local interpretation of a ritual that stretches farther back into history than most of us realize. Who knows? Maybe in a hundred years our descendants will celebrate Squirrel Day. ...

Interfraternity Council committed to elimination of hazing

As a representative of the Greek community — and the Interfraternity Council in particular — I am writing in response to the Monday's Collegian editorial titled "Greek Affairs should admit mistakes, make changes."

After reading this editorial, it became clear to me that the IFC has made a critical mistake — we have not done enough to inform the campus community of our convictions and beliefs, or to express our thoughts on subjects such as hazing within the K-State Greek system. By writing this column, I hope to meet the challenges extended in Monday's editorial and to explain the measures we've taken to improve our imperfect system.

In fall 1998, the IFC recognized a need for additional programming in the area of risk management and created the Risk Management Council. The council — a group of 14 fraternity and sorority members — educates undergraduates in two ways.

First, it sponsors educational seminars for freshmen that are focused primarily on legal, health and liability risks for minors.

Second, it sponsors educational seminars for chapter leaders that are focused primarily on Greek Affairs policies and the Greek Affairs Judicial Process.

These educational seminars are given to every K-State fraternity and sorority at least once an academic year. We believe this education is the foundation for increased awareness of risk management and is an important weapon in our fight against hazing and other forms of misconduct.

In February 1999, the IFC won the prestigious Jellison Award, given to the most exceptional IFC in a 160-university, 16-state Midwestern region. However, after speaking to several members of the Jellison Awards Committee and to leaders from other universities, we determined there were considerable weaknesses in our judicial system.

In order to correct this deficiency, the K-State IFC implemented several significant changes to the Greek Affairs Judicial Process, including the following:

— the addition of a new IFC officer, the director of judicial affairs. This officer's primary responsibility is the enforcement of our policies and the investigation of any alleged policy violations.

— the introduction of the informal complaint, which allows the IFC to act upon complaints even if the complainant wishes to remain anonymous.

— the addition of four seats to the IFC Judicial Board: Pat Bosco, dean of student life, was asked to and has appointed two K-State administrators, one K-State faculty member and one K-State alumnus to these positions. By increasing the diversity of our judicial board, we have been able to bring a wider range of viewpoints to our judicial deliberations. We believe this allows us to better serve our wide-ranging constituents, from alumni to undergrads.

— an amendment to our substance-abuse policy that requires a mandatory judicial hearing for all policy violations warranting a fine in excess of $500.

It is our continued hope that by making these changes we have begun to eliminate the problems the Collegian and other critics have brought so aptly to our attention. We are not ignorant of these problems, we are certainly not afraid to expose them and we have not been idle in trying to find solutions.

The approach the IFC has taken in order to combat our problems is a testament to the high standards set by all K-State students, both Greek and non-Greek.

We are not satisfied with the status quo, and the recent judicial hearings are the result. We have pledged ourselves to protect the Greek community and those individuals who choose to participate in it, and we will not neglect this responsibility, regardless of the embarrassment it might cause us.

It was stated in Monday's editorial that the IFC should "be brave and say, 'Yes, hazing goes on, but we are doing our best to stop it.'"

So, just for the record — yes, hazing goes on, but we are doing our best to stop it, and I think our actions during the past 18 months support this claim.

K-State students volunteer time to educate children at Sunset Zoo

By JENNIFER HOTCHKISS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Watch out, "Wild Kingdom."

No longer are people relying on books and videotapes to discover the mysteries of the animal world. Instead, they are gaining hands-on experience through the volunteer efforts of K-State students at the Sunset Zoological Park.

From snow leopard face painting and moonlit zoo tours to dressing up as the Easter Bunny and camping in Shedd's Aquarium, these K-State volunteers are educating the public and themselves at the same time.

"Volunteering is good for the soul," Dawn Engelhaupt, senior in wildlife biology, said. "It's an opportunity to help people without expecting something in return. When I come home at night, I feel good about what I did for others."

More than 150 adults and youth volunteer at the zoo each year, said Jared Bixby, co-chair of the Sunset Zoo docent program and junior in biology and elementary education.

"Personally, I believe volunteering gives you an edge," Bixby said. "You are more likely to land a competitive job if you have volunteer experiences. It's also the best stepping stone toward a future in the zoo industry."

coordinate tours and other activities to educate the public about the zoo's animals.

"The docent program enables you to help your community while doing something you love," Engelhaupt said. "You get to meet people from very different backgrounds that share a fundamental interest with you."

Engelhaupt graduated from the docent program more than three years ago. As a docent, her responsibilities have included leading zoo tours, cleaning the educational animals, painting faces at the zoo and organizing birthday parties for children.

"The docent program enables you to help your community while doing something you love."

—Dawn Engelhaupt, senior in wildlife biology

Katie Page, senior in biology, said she volunteers with the Animal Ambassador Program because it teaches her about working with the public.

"I want to pursue a career in environmental education," Page said. "It's hard to get in touch with kids and parents while you are in college. Volunteering allows me to be around people that aren't all the same age."

Some students volunteer to gain work experience.

"I want to be a zookeeper," said Melynn Serkes, senior in animal sciences and industry. "Volunteering has been a wonderful way for me to learn more about the zoo behind the scenes."

Throughout the past three years, Engelhaupt has volunteered more than 320 hours. She said finding time to volunteer can be a problem for some students.

During the summer, she volunteers up to 20 hours a week. In the winter, zoo traffic slows down considerably, and she volunteers only one hour every other week. A docent is required to volunteer 40 hours each year in order to maintain an active member status.

Another reason more students do not volunteer is because they do not know how to get involved, Page said. The spring docent training program began Monday. However, students still can join the class by contacting Sunset Zoo by next Monday.

The docent program is a good educational experience, Serkes said. Many of the lessons docents learn on the job cannot be taught in a classroom.

For example, during an Earth Day event at the zoo last year, Page worked at a station that displayed imprints of baby and adult chimpanzees' hands and feet. When a 3-year-old boy climbed into her lap to learn more about the chimps, Page was more than a little surprised at his curiosity.

Kelly Glasscock/Collegian
Lisa Riecker, junior in geography, holds a salamander under the eye of Kristin Kesler, freshmen in pre-veterinary medicine. Kesler is a docent at Sunset Zoological Park and volunteers there Tuesdays.

After she told the boy about chimpanzees, another tour group came by to listen to her presentation. Before she could get a word out, the boy proceeded to tell the group everything she had just told him.

"It was rewarding to know that I could teach him something he could remember and apply to his own life," Page said. "I quickly realized that I really could make a difference."

Investigators search Alaska Air crash site for victims, black box

By JEFF WILSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PORT HUENEME, Calif. — The pilots of Alaska Airlines Flight 261 struggled with a sudden control problem for at least six minutes before the jetliner plummeted into the ocean with 88 people aboard, federal investigators said Tuesday.

The last minutes of the MD-83's flight Monday might have been witnessed by pilots aboard four other aircraft, and the National Transportation Safety Board was seeking to interview them.

The plane plunged from 17,000 feet and crashed nose-down in the Pacific after the pilot reported problems with the horizontal stabilizer, a wing-like structure on the tail that controls the pitch of the aircraft's nose.

Investigators at the crash site also said Tuesday they had heard a pinging from the ocean, apparently from the flight recorders, which could reveal exactly what went wrong with the stabilizer.

The search was concentrated on a debris field about 10 miles offshore and about 40 miles northwest of the Los Angeles airport. Coast Guard, Navy and private vessels were joined by military airplanes.

Nearly a day after the accident, searchers had pulled four bodies — one man, two women and an infant — from the calm sea, which is 300 to 750 feet deep in the area. Hopes dimmed that anyone aboard Flight 261 survived in the 58-degree water.

"This is still a search for human life," Coast Guard Adm. Tom Collins said. "The challenge is time. As time ticks off, risks go up."

Onshore in Port Hueneme, passers-by paused to bow their heads in prayer.

"It just feels so good to stand out here and pray. It sort of cleanses you out," Diane Adame said. "You don't realize when you put someone on a plane and give them a hug that you might not see them again. I just feel for the people who lost their loved ones, especially the young ones. I guess that's what really got me."

The flight had left Puerto Vallarta, Mexico, for San Francisco and Seattle with 83 passengers and five crew members. The passengers included three airline employees, four employees of its sister airline Horizon and 23 relatives or friends of the employees taking advantage of free standby flights.

NTSB member John Hammerschmidt released preliminary transcripts of air traffic control communications with the airliner.

The last routine transmission came at 3:55 p.m. PST, when the flight was cleared to continue to San Francisco.

At 4:10 p.m. the pilots said they had control difficulties and were descending below 26,000 feet. A few seconds later they advised they were at 23,700 feet and there was some discussion about their ability to control the aircraft, Hammerschmidt said.

Over the next few minutes, the pilots said they were kind of stabilized and going to do some troubleshooting, but then said they had a jammed stabilizer. At 4:16, they were cleared for an emergency landing in Los Angeles.

The controllers cleared the plane to 17,000 feet. The crew acknowledged that in what was the last known transmission from Flight 261, Hammerschmidt said. At 4:21 p.m.

the aircraft dropped from radar.

The underwater pinging was pinpointed by a Navy team that joined in the search effort. Investigators were uncertain whether the pings were from one or both of the recorders.

One some planes, the horizontal stabilizer is monitored by the plane's data recorder. The other black box records pilot conversations.

Game against Cyclones chance to end conference road losing streak

When K-State travels to Ames, Iowa on Wednesday to play the No. 24 Iowa State Cyclones and close out this year's series, the Wildcats will have more on their mind than just winning the game.

It's not that simple anymore for the Cats, who are coming off yet another Big 12 Conference road loss on Saturday against Nebraska.

The loss to the Cornhuskers was more than just a thorn in the sides of the Cats, who, since the inception of the Big 12 in 1997, have posted a 2-26 conference road record.

For K-State (8-10, 1-6), it has been nearly a month since it won a game, and standing in front of its path to end the six-game losing trend is Cyclone junior forward Marcus Fizer.

On Jan. 8, Fizer contributed 17 points in K-State's 72-61 loss at Bramlage Coliseum.

Fizer enters the game averaging 20.4 points per game, which ranks 19th nationally and No. 1 in the conference. In fact, Fizer has been the anchor of Iowa State's 18-3 season thus far. That includes Saturday's 74-66 victory over then-No. 11 Kansas. The Cyclones' triumph over the Jayhawks propelled it into the top spot of the conference with a 6-1 mark.

At Nebraska on Saturday, K-State blew an eight-point first-half lead, losing 81-72. At the heart of the loss is K-State's inability to get to the free-throw line, where it was just 7 of 12 against the Huskers. That is a clear and measurable contrast with Nebraska, which was 28 of 41 from the free throw line.

K-State's low post has just one dominant player in senior Tony Kitt, who enters the contest averaging 13 points per game and 10.1 rebounds per game, which is 11th in the nation. Outside of Kitt's strong performance in the post, K-State is led by outside perimeter shooters Cortez Groves and Galen Morrison, who are averaging 16.2 and 12.2 points per game, respectively.

Player credits higher education, mother for talent

KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Everyone's heard the saying "Close, but no cigar."

Not many know how true those words are as well as Josh Scobey.

As a high school senior, he fell 0.025 points away from a 2.5 grade point average, a mark needed to gain NCAA eligibility. As a result, Scobey has spent the past two seasons as a running back at Northeastern Oklahoma A&M instead of K-State, where he orally committed out of high school and will play next season.

"It was tough, man," Scobey said. "When I first went to junior college it really hurt me deep — a lot of people could tell I was hurt."

Scobey had spent the better part of his senior year of high school gearing up to take, and get, at least a 17 on the ACT, all the while putting his grade point average on the back-burner.

"I attended, like, six workshops, and they were very expensive," Scobey said. "I didn't know that if you got the GPA and not the ACT score that you could be a partial qualifier."

There's a reason why everything happens, as Scobey will say, and going to NEO A&M provided all the basis he needed for that reasoning.

"It's really sad to say that a junior college was the first place that I really learned how to be a student before an athlete," Scobey said. "I gained so much there, when I thought I would lose so much."

Gooden to join team at Division II college

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Eric Gooden no longer is a member of the K-State football family.

Gooden, a running back, has transferred to the University of Central Oklahoma. Central Oklahoma defensive backs coach Chuck Bailey said Tuesday that Gooden is already in school.

"When he came back from the bowl game, he contacted us about coming and playing here, and we contacted K-State about it, and they released him," Bailey said. "With this being a Division II school, he was eligible to play."

K-State Sports Information Director Kent Brown said Gooden left the team to pursue other interests.

Brown said that if Gooden had transferred to a Division I-A school, he would've had to sit out a year; however, being at Oklahoma, he is eligible to play right away.

With the Cats last season, Gooden ran for 132 yards on 37 carries in seven games.

His longest run of the season was 22 yards.

Next season with Central Oklahoma,

Gooden, who was unable to be reached, is likely to be one of three running backs rotating through the system.

"He wanted to play more, and he thought that he would have a better chance with us," Bailey said.

The school, in Edmond, Okla., is a good fit for Gooden, geographically. It is about a 15-minute drive from his hometown of Midwest City, Okla.

Intramural basketball draws almost 300 teams

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

The parking lot is packed and the action is hot inside as groups of basketball teams prepare to play. Is it a state tournament time at Bramlage Coliseum? No, it's intramural basketball.

Steve Martini, intramurals director, said the leagues began last Sunday, and that basketball is the dominant intramural this time of year.

"We have about 300 teams with different skill levels and leagues," Martini said. "The leagues are broken into either six or five team leagues and the season lasts five weeks. After that, the playoffs start."

The leagues are composed of residence hall groups as well as Greek houses and independents.

Columnist offers primer, predictions, playoff favorites for 2nd half of NHL season

VIEWPOINT

RICHARD SMITH

After much deliberation, the NHL wins out over the NFL this week as the subject of my column, primarily by virtue of being the league where people don't murder each other.

The NHL enters its All-Star break this weekend in reasonably good shape in its ongoing push to reach the limelight of national non-indifference. For those of you who aren't acquainted with hockey (all but about eight of you), here's a primer on the upcoming second half of the season and the state of the league so you can dive in and enjoy hockey now that football season is over.

Good: The recent fad of the "neutral zone trap" defense is dying out. This method of defending by clogging up the middle of the ice had led to less offense, more penalties and lots of ties in recent years. Speed-oriented teams such as the Florida Panthers, Toronto Maple Leafs and St. Louis Blues have begun to solve the puzzle, however, and are creating a more exciting brand of hockey.

Good: The new four-on-four overtime format has been a success so far, decreasing ties and increasing scoring across the league.

Good: The Fox network and the league finally have realized that the road to team sports legitimacy isn't paved with "FoxScopes," glowing pucks and animated robots, and mercifully have parted ways.

ABC instead will pick up the NHL for the first time this season. Whether the production values will improve is iffy, given the battalions of alien robots depicted worshipping Eddie George in some of ABC's Super Bowl graphics.

However, this deal opens the door for the intriguing possibility of Regis Philbin in a New York Rangers uniform. Think about it — he'd provide a TV ratings boost (he does everywhere else), he wouldn't rock the boat name-wise (he'd fit in well with the Manny Malhotras and Petr Nedveds of the world), and he could help the Rangers' power play (rimshot).

Even failing that potential stroke of marketing genius, at least ABC's name value and higher overall ratings should bring relief to a league in need of greater visibility and give you one less excuse not to watch the games.

So, you have the media and strategic trends involving the game down now, right? Good. Next is to get up to speed on the key teams and players. Here are a few bold second-half thoughts and predictions to test out on people at the water cooler. Feel free to clip and save for future reference.

The Eastern Conference

MVP: Pavel Bure. The Russian Rocket basically is the Panthers' offense, as his league-leading 35 goals have put an otherwise average Florida squad in third place in the conference.

Playoff favorite: New Jersey. Star center Scott Gomez is the linchpin in a front line with a great balance of grit and scoring. The defense is excellent with Scott Stevens on the back line and Martin Brodeur in net.

No other team in the league is as well-balanced.

Potential sleeper: Toronto. Goalie Curtis Joseph (my MVP runner-up) is one of the best. He keeps pucks out of the Leafs' net, and a stable of talented forwards can put them in other team's goal.

Potential Disappointment: Philadelphia. A recent trade for star center Keith Primeau may look good on paper, but it only made the Flyers bigger and slower in a conference that is getting faster and more skilled. Add that to weak defense, and Philly won't get far in the postseason.

The Western Conference

MVP: Pierre Turgeon. For the first time in his career, the slick Blues center is playing as well in his own end, as he is offensively. The scoring end has stayed up as well — he's fifth in the league.

Playoff Favorite: St. Louis. The Blues are nipping at the first-place Detroit Red Wings' heels. St. Louis' fast-breaking style of play will be effective against slower teams in the playoffs. The Blues' defense and goaltending are superb, and they're overdue to come out on top if they face the Red Wings again in the playoffs.

Potential Sleeper: Colorado. A recent game against Anaheim was the first time all season that the whole roster was healthy. Goalie Patrick Roy is playoff-proven, and if a talented group of forwards featuring three All-Stars can stay healthy, the Avalanche could bury some teams.

Potential Disappointment: Phoenix. Sure, the Coyotes might be leading their division right now, but they have talent every single season and never go anywhere with it. Sure, Jeremy Roenick finally is playing well, but we'll see whether he (and the Coyotes) can keep it up in the playoffs.

Martini said, for a team to make postseason play, it need to have a record at the .500 level or better.

League players said they have a variety of different reasons for playing. The leagues are set up to make some of the leagues much more competitive, and others play for relaxation and leisure.

Kim Morrison, junior in management information systems, has been playing intramural basketball for a while. She started playing along with her fellow team members back in high school. She and her teammates comprise OFIS, "one fine intramural squad."

The squad, Morrison said, originally formed when a lot of the women lived together in Ford Hall as freshmen, and Morrison said the team's goals are mixed.

"We only have five players, so we are probably going to lose," Morrison said. "But it's fun. It is a good way to get out and be with friends. Mostly it is just for fun, we don't have any practices or anything."

While some of the games are played for fun, Martini said all the games have officials. He said that for basketball season, the recreation center has about 50 officials on staff.

One of those officials for basketball is Bryan Hay, senior in accounting. Hay is in his second year as an official and he said he is proud of the way the center runs its programs.

"I think we have a pretty good system here," Hay said. "Some of the games are fun, but the big games can be pretty stressful."

Jeremiah Popelka, freshman in business, said he does not know what to expect from his first season playing intramural basketball.

"Football was great, volleyball was fun," Popelka said. "But now it's basketball, so we will see what happens."

Vermeil retires as coach in wake of Super Bowl winBy R.B. FALLSTROM
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ST. LOUIS — Dick Vermeil is going out on top.

On Tuesday, two days after winning his first Super Bowl and after a talk with his wife, the 63-year-old coach of the St. Louis Rams announced his retirement. His eyes filled with tears and his voice choked with emotion, Vermeil said it was an unbelievable feeling to leave as a champion.

"I think the time is right," he said, the Super Bowl trophy sitting on a table to his right and a blue wheelbarrow symbolizing his work ethic to the left. "Very few people in this profession get this opportunity."

Vermeil made a quick decision because he didn't want to be involved with the free agency period that starts Feb. 11. He leaves with two years to go on a five-year, $9 million contract.

"I don't want to participate in that," Vermeil said. "I don't want to cut the squad. These are my guys."

Owner Georgia Frontiere tried to talk Vermeil out of it, team president John Shaw said he at least should wait to make sure and special teams coach Frank Ganz made an impassioned plea. Rams players just wanted the best for the coach who made it a point to get to know all of them.

"I feel indebted to coach Vermeil," said linebacker London Fletcher, who also urged Vermeil to stick around. "He gave me an opportunity that maybe nobody else would have, and I'm very grateful."

Linebacker Mike Jones, who made the game-saving tackle on Tennessee's Kevin Dyson, said looking back that Vermeil dropped a few clues on the flight back from Atlanta but "I never put it together."

"It's a great legacy," Jones said, "going from worst to first."

San Francisco general manager Bill Walsh, a longtime friend of Vermeil, agreed with the coach that the time was right.

"At this stage of his life, he's accomplished everything," Walsh said. "Now it's time for him to thoroughly enjoy the rewards of what he's accomplished."

This exit was a lot different than the first time he walked away from NFL coaching, complaining of burnout when he left the Philadelphia Eagles in 1982.

The decision elevates offensive coordinator Mike Martz to coach. The Rams signed Martz, who directed the NFL's top-rated offense (33 points a game) to a two-year contract in January that assured he would inherit Vermeil's job.

"I told everyone before the season that Mike Martz was the type of coach who would go after it — from the first game to the last," said Isaac Bruce, who caught the winning touchdown pass in the Super Bowl.

Martz, scheduled to undergo surgery Wednesday for a neck problem, didn't attend the news conference. A Rams spokesman said Martz would postpone surgery and hold a news conference Wednesday.

Vermeil coached two Super Bowl teams 19 years apart. He led the Eagles to the Super Bowl in 1981, and that 27-10 loss fueled his return to the profession in 1997.

Vermeil led the Rams to a 13-3 record this year after winning only nine games his first two years. Following last year's 4-12 mark, there was talk that he could be fired.

During the Super Bowl buildup, Vermeil hedged on his future. On one hand, he liked coaching. On the other hand, Carol Vermeil, his wife of 44 years, told him, "What else do you have to prove?"

Vermeil said his wife brought up the possibility of retirement after the Rams beat the Minnesota Vikings in the playoffs. They talked about it again following the parade through downtown St. Louis on Monday, a day after the Rams' 23-16 victory.

Finally, the couple discussed retirement again, briefly, Tuesday morning. Vermeil said, however, it was strictly his decision.

The driving force behind his education in the classroom, as well as on the football field, came from a pep talk his mother gave him shortly leaving for NEO A&M.

"My mom told me that I had a battle to fight and that if I didn't bounce back from this and not go through junior college and do the right thing — that I would lose the battle," Scobey said.

Scobey picked up a few other things while he was at NEO A&M. Plenty of that help came from head football coach Dale Patterson, who has sent four running backs to the NFL.

"He ranks right up there with all of them," Patterson said. "He's one of the best I've ever had."

Last year, Scobey rushed for 1,135 yards on 214 carries, while also scoring 15 touchdowns. He was named a second team All-American by the National Junior College Athletic Association.

With his 6-foot-1-inch, 210-pound frame and 4.4 40-yard dash speed, Patterson said Scobey hits the hole fast and is a slashing type of running back.

However, one of Scobey's missions at K-State is to run between the tackles with more authority than he did at NEO A&M.

"I think that's one of the things a great running back has — the ability to run between the tackles," Scobey said. "At this level and the next level, it's really hard to run out on the corners without being run out of bounds because everyone has great speed."

When it came down to deciding where he would continue his college career, Scobey said it wasn't much of a decision. Even though schools such as Nebraska, UCLA, Michigan, Colorado and Texas A&M were recruiting him, he decided on K-State, where he already is attending classes for the spring 2000 semester.

"Coach Snyder is building a tradition right now, and it's really going to be great in the long run," Scobey said. "Kansas State doesn't have the tradition that Texas or Nebraska or OU or Notre Dame has right now, but 20 or 25 years from now, they'll have their tradition."

"I wanted to be a part of that so I can look back and say that I helped build it, that I had a piece of the pie," Scobey said.

Like every college football player, Scobey has aspirations of playing in the NFL, but unlike many who don't realize the odds, he has a contingency plan.

"I'd love to play in the NFL — if I'm fortunate enough, amen," Scobey said. "I have a great plan B, though — I'm a business major ... so if the NFL's not for me, then I'm a business man and I'm going to get out in the world and make business."

Despite the presence of senior-to-be David Allen, and the knowledge that Scobey said he will gain from Allen, he said that he won't be on the sidelines next year.

"That's one thing I came here for — to play," he said.

Sharon Remmert takes inventory in the vegetable prep walk in the refrigerator Tuesday in the Derby Food Center.

Dining center honors excellence

By BRIAN CLARK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sharon Remmert has organized and served a countless amount of meals throughout her life.

"It makes me feel proud that I accomplished 30 years," she said.

Remmert, the Derby Dining Center's coordinator of receiving, storage and inventory since 1988, was one of 15 Housing and Dining Services employees honored at an awards ceremony Jan. 11 at the Derby Dining Center.

She was recognized for 30 years of service with the dining halls.

Mary Molt, assistant director for Housing and Dining Services, said the ceremony has been held annually since at least the opening of the Kramer Dining Center in 1960. The ceremony was also open to invited retirees, giving current employees a chance to connect with the past, Molt said.

"The key to the success of Housing and Dining is our really good work force," Molt said.

"Our employees are very committed and loyal to Kansas State and to Housing and Dining Services. We've won numerous awards, mainly because of our work force."

Remmert came to K-State in 1969 after running a day care from her home.

She was relief help in the kitchen for two years before being approached about the available bakery supervisor's job. Remmert accepted the position because she said she had a love for baking.

"I love being creative," Remmert said. "And at baking you can do that. You can gain an increased knowledge of baking between work and home."

The bakery eventually opened a retail location in the Derby Dining Center. However, the creativity that attracted Remmert in the beginning was waning.

"I enjoyed working in the bakery, but I wanted a change because the bakery was becoming more monotonous," Remmert said. "When the coordinator's position came open, it was a godsend. It really helped to regain my interest."

Remmert is now responsible for maintaining proper amounts of foodstuffs and dry goods for the Derby Dining Center. She orders goods, maintains inventory and alerts personnel about shortages of certain goods.

"It's a challenge, but it is fun," Remmert said. "I enjoy what I'm doing."

"You have to be able to get along with everyone. There are going to be problems, but if you can get through them, you can get through anything. You have to have dedication, and a commitment to the job," she said.

Outside of K-State, Remmert is active on committees at the University Christian Church and through the Wolf House of the Riley County Historical Society. She also enjoys gardening, sewing and "spending time at home" with her husband David and her three grandchildren.

One of the other honorees at the ceremony was Chris Wenger, line supervisor at Derby Dining Center. She was honored for 20 years service to Housing and Dining Services.

Student disagrees with election process

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Greeks make up about 20 percent of the undergraduate student body; Greeks make up about 55 percent of the Student Senate.

This was one of the main concerns of Heath Schroeder, who raised his concerns during the open period of last Thursday's Senate meeting.

Schroeder, junior in finance and pre-optometry, wants to change the process of voting for elected student representatives. He said the current system, where students vote for as many seats as there are available in their college, results in the student body's being disproportionately represented.

Citing Article 1, Section 102 of the Student Life Handbook, Schroeder said the Student Governing Association isn't even following its purpose. The section states that "The KSU SGA, in pursuit of its stated purpose, shall act in accordance with the principles of equality before the law, separation of powers, proportional representation and university suffrage."

Schroeder's idea is for students only to vote for one student to represent them and then the top vote-getters will fill the available seats for that college.

"I think you'll get more representation of the student body profile in Student Senate," he said.

The current system allows for students in organized living groups to go vote for the people representing their group, Schroeder said.

"It inflates the number it takes to get elected, causing those who have lower voting pools — minority groups or those who live off campus and know less people — to have an unfair chance of getting elected," he said. "People across the campus know that it's geared toward organized living groups."

Bill Muir, Faculty Senate representative, said he doesn't think organized living groups give their members a better advantage of getting elected.

"I looked up last year's voting and in order to get elected to Senate you had to get 120 votes," he said. "I don't know of any living group who has that many people in one curriculum."

Muir said Schroeder's proposal is undemocratic.

"I just think that people ought to have as large variety of choices as they can," he said. "People representing their colleges has been the historical tradition."

Schroeder said he has done some research behind his idea.

He said he has talked to many student government members across the nation and more than 50 percent of the ones he researched had a Senate that is composed of both representatives of colleges and organizations of living groups and organizations on campus. Fifty percent of the Student Senate would be made up of representatives of colleges and 50 percent would be made up of a member from the Interfraternity Council, Panhellenic Council, multicultural groups and nontraditional students.

Schroeder said his idea is a hybrid of this system and of an idea proposed in the past that Senate be made up entirely of students representing living groups.

"What I'm trying to do is create a level playing field," he said. "Greeks have a lot of great leaders, but they don't need to overpower it."

Jason Heinrich, student body president, said he didn't think Greeks' representing a disproportionate amount of the student body was a problem.

"The issue has been brought up before. There are maybe a disproportionate number of students that happen to be Greek, but I don't see it as a big problem," he said. "I can't think of any instance where someone voted on something or brought forth something that had anything to do with them being Greek or non-Greek."

"I like the fact that we are represented by our colleges," Heinrich said. "When you start representing groups of people, things become more emotional and personal."

Heinrich said he didn't think Student Senate dealt with any issues that would make a difference if a student senator was Greek or non-Greek.

This is what concerns Schroeder. He said there are issues outside of campus that might not affect members of organized living groups, but need to be dealt with.

"There is no legislation being passed for people who live off campus," he said.

One issue that Schroeder said Senate should be dealing with but is not is mandatory rental inspections. He said this affects 67 percent of the student body, which lives off campus.

Schroeder said students living in organized living groups don't get the full picture of what's happening outside of campus.

Despite the opposition to the election process, Schroeder said he still will run in the upcoming election, which will use the current system with the only change being the addition of online voting.

Muir said he thinks online voting will help curb the disproportionate numbers in Senate; however, he said the most important thing is getting the best leaders in Student Senate — independent or Greek.

Beihl and Hedman dedicate time to music, release 1st CD

Disregarding popularity—two words that might contain a strong meaning.

To Beihl and Hedman, a musical duo that just released its first compact disk, the meaning might be a little different than to the average person. To this group, these two words embody much time, talent and energy.

"One of the songs on the CD has a part in it that says 'disregarding popularity,'" Bree Hedman, junior in mechanical engineering, said. "It's definitely not your run-of-the-mill, everyday stuff."

Hedman teams up with 1996 K-State graduate Pam Beihl to form a guitar/piano duo with vocals. After numerous hours of work on songs, graphics and design, the two musicians recently recorded their first CD with Arnoldsound. Copies of the CD are available at Streetside Records in Aggieville. Arnoldsound does most of the recording for K-State, Hedman said.

Beihl and Hedman began as members of the Seven Dolores Catholic Church choir.

"We met playing in our church choir," Hedman said. "We played together a couple of times, and she told me that she writes her own songs. I started putting piano arrangements with her guitar."

Beihl plays the guitar and sings lead, while Hedman accompanies on the piano and adds vocal harmony.

"As far as style goes, it spans several genres, but the core element of it is folk," Hedman said. "It's very acoustic."

Both Beihl and Hedman said they are excited about the release of their CD.

"We started playing about two years ago, and we just did it for fun," Hedman said. "We started this summer working on our CD, and we finally put it out."

Hedman said the CD's release wasn't for profit, but represented a much deeper sense of accomplishment.

"The CD is more for us than to sell it," she said. "At first, we were just going to have a few family and friends get them. Now, we've had to print some more."

Beihl and Hedman said there is a large time commitment involved in music, which can become frustrating.

"Sometimes it's a challenge just getting to play," Beihl said. "We're so busy. Also, sometimes figuring out what we want to play can be difficult."

Hedman said their dedication to music and other aspects of their lives requires them to establish priorities.

"It's hard when you have so much that is so important to you," Hedman said. "It's so important for me to get my degree, and music is so important to both of us. With all of the time and energy, it can get very draining."

As far as what the future has in store for the band, Hedman said she remains realistic.

"It'd be so wonderful if this could be my job, but the reality is, you have all of this other stuff you have to do," Hedman said. "We have written four or five more songs, so maybe another CD is in the future."

Jordan Schuette, junior in accounting, said she thinks Beihl and Hedman have the talent to become famous beyond the Manhattan city limits.

"I think they have the ability, but they both have jobs and other things going on, so I don't know if they'll pursue it," she said.

In the meantime, the group enjoys just getting together and playing, and hopes to continue performing in the future.

"We will be playing at Espresso on Feb. 22," Hedman said. "We haven't really been looking for places. We've just been working on putting our CD out, but we may try going to bars."

Both Hedman and Beihl said the best part of music is just finding time to sit down and play.

"It's great just getting to play music," Beihl said. "She (Hedman) has a lot of enthusiasm, which makes it a lot of fun."

"It's amazing to be able to share music with other people," Hedman said. "Right now, I just want to relax and get back to playing all of the time, because that's what I love."

Schuette said she enjoys Beihl and Hedman's live performances.

"I'm their first fan up there, other than Bree's mom, of course," she said.

"I like their originality. It's different music than you hear on the radio."

Beihl and Hedman can be e-mailed at beihlandhedman@arnoldsound.com. CDs can be purchased by e-mail at a reduced cost. The group's next concert is scheduled for 8 p.m. Feb. 22 at Espresso Royale, 618 N. Manhattan Ave.

Renowned ballet group to perform at McCain

By JAINA K. STUTHEIT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's a one-time opportunity. Bordeaux Ballet, a world-famous ballet company from France, will be performing its "Tribute to Diaghilev" at 7:30 p.m. Thursday in McCain Auditorium.

Richard Martin, director of McCain, said he booked the ballet because it would help to create a well-rounded season of performances.

"During each season, we try to have a variety of events such as musical theater, opera, orchestra and dance," Martin said.

Martin also said he brought the ballet to McCain because it offers works that other ballet companies aren't performing, including two works that created a revolution in dance.

"We want to let students see something they've never seen before," Martin said.

Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer of McCain, said Bordeaux Ballet has a cast of more than 60 dancers.

"This is one of the finest ballet companies that tour," Jackson said.

Jackson said the show basically is a review of the work of Serge Diaghilev, creator of the famous Ballets Russes.

"Tribute to Diaghilev" showcases four of his main ballets:

■ TICKET INFO? Ticket prices are $34, $28 and $24 for the public; $32, $26 and $22 for senior citizens; and $17, $14 and $12 for students and children.

Petrouchka is a clown who is in love with the dancer puppet, but she is in love with another puppet. Petrouchka tries to win the heart of the dancer, but he fails and dies at the end.

Martin said "Petrouchka" debuted June 13, 1911. He said the man who played the original Petrouchka, Vaclav Nijinsky, is to ballet what Babe Ruth is to baseball.

"What he did was so remarkable, it changed forever the way people looked at ballet," he said.

Allison Elliott, McCain box office employee and senior in political science and history, said tickets still are available in all three sections.

"We still have a moderate amount of tickets left," she said.

Jackson said he is pleased that the ballet is coming to McCain and that he hopes for a large audience.

"It's a ballet that is often overlooked, because it's outside the norm of what most people want to see," he said.

Drug use increases in high schools

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Instances of drug use among adolescents raised both in rural and urban areas is a growing concern for Manhattan and its surrounding communities.

A particular substance being abused by local youth is receiving special attention, said Jay Hooper, a retired counselor at Riley County High School and member of the Little Apple Task Force.

"Our main focus is alcohol and all the kids around here that are getting it illegally," Hooper said.

The task force, a local organization devoted to the prevention of drug and alcohol abuse, was organized by the Lions Club of Manhattan almost 20 years ago, Hooper said, when a town meeting was called to discuss problems local parents frequently encounter. Almost 200 Manhattan residents attended the meeting, and the task force was established.

Today, the program partly is responsible for alcohol-free programs such as Manhattan High School's after-prom party, which gives students the option of a drug-free party.

Mary Beth Reese, substance-abuse prevention counselor at Manhattan High, said alcohol can be a problem among students.

"So many kids drink illegally," Reese said. "College kids make it accessible to students, and that issue is so much from being in a university town."

Many factors contribute to the frequent abuse of alcohol among local youth, Hooper said.

"A lot of that has been due to TV and glamorization you see of that, and also the more opportunity to buy liquor," he said. "The more you increase the availability, the easier it is to get."

The sale of beer at grocery stores, liquor sales in bars on Sundays, local parties and the draw of Aggieville are just some of the contributing factors to underage drinking, Hooper said.

Jerry Lyons, clinical psychologist and program manager of alcohol and drug services at Pawnee Mental Health Center, said alcohol was just one of the area's problems.

"Alcohol and marijuana are gaining pretty steady in this area," Lyons said. "Cocaine has started to increase, too, but it's trivial with our population."

An explosion that occurred in Manhattan on Jan. 25, one that possibly was linked to a methamphetamine lab, also has raised concern about the availability of the drug around Riley County, Lyons said.

"More and more, meth labs are in rural communities because of the chemicals that are involved in the production," he said. "You need a rural area, because in Kansas City, neighbors would complain about the odor and call the police."

With the open farm land that surrounds Manhattan, Reese said methamphetamines are becoming common around the state.

"The top-three states for meth labs are California, Kansas and Missouri," she said. "It's more commonplace in rural cities now that it's starting to expand in availability."

Reese said that when it comes to working with students at Manhattan High, controlling smoking is more of a problem than anything else.

"Tobacco is the number-one drug of choice," she said. "Students start in grade school or middle school, and when they're addicted, it takes them several times before they can quit. I've helped several students quit, though."

The desire of some students to quit smoking has made local counselors hopeful that their peers will follow suit, Reese said.

"We always focus on the negative, but we do have a lot of kids getting things right," Reese said.

Study says rural teens more apt to use drugs

By GENARO C. ARMAS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Illegal drug use among adolescents in small-town and rural America is reaching alarming proportions, according to a private study that urges the government to spend as much money fighting drugs in nonmetropolitan areas as it does in Colombia and other foreign countries.

Eighth-graders in rural America are 104-percent likelier than those in urban centers to use amphetamines, including methamphetamines, and 50-percent likelier to use cocaine, according to the study. Eighth-graders in rural areas also are 83-percent likelier to use crack cocaine, and 34-percent likelier to smoke marijuana than eighth-graders in urban centers, the study said.

"We've long heard the warning, and we're trying to reach beyond the cities to the suburbs and rural areas to see the reach of drugs across America," Attorney General Janet Reno told the U.S. Conference of Mayors on Wednesday. "We have to look at a radius beyond the cities."

The study by the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University was released Wednesday at the mayors' winter meeting here. It was based primarily on 1999 data.

"Bluntly put, meth has come to Main Street, along with other drugs and with magnum force aimed at our children," said Joseph A. Califano Jr., president of the research group. "It's time for all Americans to recognize that drugs are not only an urban problem."

To help counter the trend, Califano called on the Clinton administration and Congress to adopt a $1.6 billion emergency aid package to fight drugs in rural America. On Tuesday, Clinton proposed a two-year, $1.6 billion aid plan for Colombia, in part to assist with anti-drug efforts there.

Clinton and Congress must match dollar for dollar aid to Colombia with aid to the rural communities, Califano said.

Califano's group used five sets of data, from public and private anti-drug organizations, to come up with their results, and studied data from state and local law-enforcement agencies. Each data set defined big cities and urban centers in different ways, but in general, they classified rural areas as those with populations of 50,000 or less.

The study's results are frightening regardless of the way towns are classified, said Susie Dugan, executive director of Parent Resources and Information on Drug Education Inc. in Omaha, Neb.

"If the study's results are true, I'm not surprised," said Dugan, whose group works in Omaha, a city of about 365,000 people, as well as outlying rural areas. "Our kids today are thinking it's no big deal to use drugs."

"I would support any increase in all aspects of drug prevention — not just interdiction, but prevention in rural areas too," she said. "We haven't spent adequate amounts in prevention."

Boise, Idaho Mayor H. Brent Coles, co-chairman of the Conference of Mayors Drug Control Task Force, said, "A coordinated effort among local, state and federal governments will be essential to reduce both demand and supply and finally turn the tide against drug abuse throughout America's big cities and small towns."

New military training to protect targets of anti-gay harassment

By ROBERT BURNS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The nation's military services for the first time have issued written guidelines to ensure that troops who complain of anti-gay threats or harassment are not themselves investigated.

The intent is to allow such complaints to be aired without fear of being drummed out of the service for being homosexual.

Defense Secretary William Cohen said Tuesday the new guidelines on how to investigate anti-gay threats are incorporated in updated training programs designed to ensure that the Clinton administration's "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays is enforced fairly and uniformly throughout the services.

As a matter of policy, commanders are not to use complaints of anti-gay harassment or threats as a reason to investigate the complaining person. Instead, the commanders are supposed to investigate the source of the threat or harassment.

"These plans make it very clear ... that there is no room for harassment or threats in the military," Cohen said in a written statement.

"Service members need to understand that harassment for any reason will not be tolerated, and commanders will take prompt, appropriate actions against individuals involved in such behavior," Cohen said.

The Pentagon also announced Tuesday the number of discharges from the military in the fiscal year ended last Sept. 30 fell to 1,034 from 1,145 in the year-earlier period. Spokesman Kenneth Bacon said 83.5 percent of discharges resulted from statements by service members that they were homosexual.

Under the administration's policy, gays can serve in the military as long as they keep their sexual orientation to themselves. If they state that they are homosexual, they are supposed to be removed from the service.

In 1994, the first full year of

"don't ask, don't tell," discharges totaled 617. They rose every year since until 1999.

Michelle Benecke, executive director of the Servicemembers Legal Defense Fund, welcomed Cohen's approval of the training guidelines but said such guidance should have been made available to field commanders years ago.

"We're glad to see, finally, that the secretary is taking steps to train people," Benecke said. She said her group has found most service members who declare their homosexuality, and thereby are removed from the service, do so because they feel threatened by an anti-gay environment in their workplace.

"What is needed now is for leaders to enforce the harassment guidelines with commitment," Benecke said.

Cohen instructed the services to develop new training guidelines last December amid widening criticism that administration policy on gays in the military was not working. The criticism sharpened after a court-martial in which an Army private was convicted of murdering a gay soldier harassed with the knowledge of his superiors. President Clinton called the Pentagon's implementation of the administration policy out of whack.

Cohen also asked each of the service's top civilian and uniformed leaders to issue statements to their troops reinforcing the policy against harassment of gays.

In a joint statement, Air Force Secretary F. Whitten Peters and the Air Force chief of staff, Gen. Michael Ryan, said, "Harassment, threats or ridicule of individuals or groups based upon their real or perceived differences, including sexual orientation, have no place in the United States Air Force and will not be tolerated."

The Army's statement said, "We expect commanders at every level to take appropriate action to prevent harassment of or threats against any member of our Army."

Lawyer says Lewis not guilty of murder

By JAMES PILCHER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — NFL star Ray Lewis was at a post-Super Bowl brawl in which two people were stabbed to death, but he simply was in the wrong place at the wrong time, his lawyer said Tuesday.

The Baltimore Ravens linebacker, his hands shackled in front of him, appeared in court early Monday on two counts of murder in the slayings. No bail was set and he will remain jailed until a Feb. 24 preliminary hearing.

The murder charges carry life in prison or the death penalty, if prosecutors pursue it.

Lewis is the second NFL player in less than a month accused of murder. Former Carolina Panthers receiver Rae Carruth was charged with murdering his girlfriend, who was pregnant at the time of the drive-by shooting.

NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue had no comment, but Gene Washington, the NFL's chief disciplinarian, called Lewis' arrest devastating.

"We've had a tough year as it goes anyway, with the Rae Carruth situation," he told One-on-One sports radio network in Chicago. "We certainly, for his own good, hope that it's not true, and for the good of the NFL."

The Ravens said they have not taken any action against Lewis and have not spoken with the 24-year-old player.

Asked if the team was considering releasing Lewis, Ravens spokesman Kevin Byrne said, "Until due process of the law is completed, that will not be addressed."

Several of Lewis' teammates responded with disbelief at his arrest.

"That's my man," Ravens cornerback Rod Woodson, whose locker is next to Lewis', said from the Pro Bowl in Hawaii. "I hope it ain't true. That's all I can say."

The victims were stabbed repeatedly during a fight about 200 yards from a bar where a party had emptied into the street.

According to witnesses, six men fought and argued with the victims before fleeing in a black limousine, firing at least five shots as they drove away. Police found the limousine a few hours later.

"We're taking the position that he was in the wrong place at the wrong time," Lewis' lawyer, Max Richardson Jr., said outside court. "From what I've gathered from law-enforcement officers, they know Ray didn't kill these unfortunate victims."

He said police were searching for other suspects.

"They don't know where the other two men who were involved are, so they arrested Ray," Richardson said.

Police spokeswoman Marion Lee would not comment on whether other suspects were being sought or why murder charges were filed.

Lewis was questioned Monday and postponed a flight to Hawaii, where he was to have appeared Sunday in his third straight Pro Bowl after leading the NFL in tackles this season.

"I cooperated fully," Lewis told The (Baltimore) Sun before his arrest. He would not comment further.

Richardson said he had spent only a few minutes with Lewis before the hearing.

"Ray is doing fine," he said. "He believes the system will ultimately show that he is innocent of these heinous crimes."

Lewis also faces second-degree assault charges from a Nov. 30 confrontation at a Baltimore-area bar in which he allegedly hit a woman. But authorities said Tuesday the case will not go to trial if the charge cannot be substantiated.

The victims from the Super Bowl fight were identified as Jatin "Shorty" Baker, 21, and Richard Lollar, 24, both of suburban Decatur.

Lollar's grandmother said several of Lollar's friends told her he had been trying to break up a fight between Baker and an unidentified man when a group of men ambushed them.

Investigators probe cause of Kenya Airways crash

86 bodies recovered;
179 people were on board.

By TIM SULLIVAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ABIDJAN, Ivory Coast — Grieving relatives of the victims of the Kenya Airways plane crash came to the Ivory Coast on Tuesday, searching for news of their loved ones and sometimes finding the answer in Abidjan's morgue.

Ten people survived the crash into the Atlantic Ocean on Sunday night only moments after takeoff. Officials said 179 people were aboard Flight 431 bound for Nigeria, but only 86 bodies have been recovered.

Family members and friends were kept waiting for hours at the morgue by officials who were processing the bodies. The authorities are totally overwhelmed, said Jean-Luc Serie, an Ivorian looking for the body of a colleague.

"They don't have the means to deal with something like this. It's a question of training," he said, shaking his head after being turned away.

When some relatives finally were allowed in, they found corpses piled on the floor and an overwhelming odor.

"It's not normal," said Adigoun Tajudwan, a Nigerian trying to locate his sister-in-law. "How can anyone recognize the bodies?"

A team of 14 firefighters looked for bodies Tuesday afternoon, but found none. Because of water currents, search efforts were concentrated about nine to 12 miles from the crash site, said fire department rescue coordinator Lt. Col. Blaise Grah.

Fishermen also were asked to report any sightings of corpses found floating in the ocean or washed up on the shore.

Engineers and investigators from Kenya Airways were meeting with Ivorian aviation officials at Abidjan's Felix Houphouet-Boigny Airport, said Fred Kige, spokesman for a crisis committee set up by the airline.

No investigators have visited the crash site, and no efforts had been made to retrieve the aircraft's flight recorders.

"We are a country of modest means and we have to acknowledge we do not have the equipment for deep-sea diving," Grah said.

Firefighters have instead identified private companies who could assist when Kenya decided to send its own divers, Grah said.

A small mound of wreckage — an overhead light, a few seats and dozens of yards of wiring — lay at the port where it was dropped off by search boats.

The plane, an Airbus 310, had taken off at 9:08 p.m. Witnesses said the plane never appeared to reach sufficient altitude as it headed out over the ocean, just a few hundred yards away. They heard no explosion and saw no flames.

Kenya Airways Technical Director Steve Clarke, speaking in Nairobi, said he had no information Tuesday on what caused the crash, but he said the airline has begun to debrief the crew that flew the aircraft to Abidjan from Nairobi on Sunday.

"We have this morning sat down with the captain who took the plane to Abidjan. He has confirmed that the aircraft was fully serviceable and operating perfectly normally," Clarke said.

A team of engineers from Airbus, the French-based consortium that manufactured the plane, as well as French accident investigators were joining efforts to determine the cause of the crash.

U.S.-based General Electric Co., which made the plane's engine, said Tuesday it too would send representatives, including a flight safety specialist.

Clarke said Kenya was sending 21 navy divers to assist in the search for bodies, while a barge, diving gear and hoisting equipment were on the way from Senegal to help search for the flight data recorder and the cockpit voice recorder.

The airline released a list of 26 victims from the United Arab Emirates, Zambia, Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, Burkina Faso, Mali, Nigeria, Congo, Rwanda, India and Ghana.

Among those still missing were two Americans, U.S. Embassy officials said without providing any further details.

A Canadian missionary couple from Hamilton, Ontario, also were registered on the flight, relatives said Monday.

Aubri Olson, senior at Flint Hills Christian School, has been in the same private school since kindergarten. Despite being in a school with a senior class of nine, she is looking forward to going to college next year and being among larger crowds of people.

They receive teaching materials from Bob Jones University in South Carolina and attend conferences where new material is presented and ideas are exchanged.

"The fellowship that goes on helps us continually to get better," Keenan said. "It keeps us aware of legislation and laws. It's a good information tool as well."

Critics of home school might worry about the other aspects that a private or public school can provide.

However, the extracurricular activities and camaraderie that goes hand-in-hand with learning was not overlooked, Nada Ingalsbe said.

All three children participate in baseball and basketball tournaments against other teams that belong to the Christian home-school group. They often play during the weekends at St. George's school.

In exchange for the use of the gym, they go in once a week to help elementary school students with their schoolwork. They also have made friends through church.

This interaction exposes them to the same issues their friends in private and public high schools face, such as drugs and alcohol.

Aaron and Adam said they've learned how to deal with these issues and become informed on them. Keenan Ingalsbe said although there have been times when they've been tested, they've come through.

They've encountered pressures, either through talks with their friends or what they go through, but they're prepared by their parents' teachings and strengthened by proverbs, Keenan Ingalsbe said.

The biggest challenge of home schooling, though, is consistency, he said.

"Even though there are struggles, we feel we've done well," Keenan said. "That's our goal, to continue to place things in front of them that challenge them."

Every year, the Christian home-schooling group has a graduation. There are 12 people graduating this year, including Aaron.

"When we first started home-schooling, we had the mind set to do it until third or fourth grade," Nada Ingalsbe said. "And then, as we got into it, we wanted to continue. The benefits are working as a family. Having strong families is important to our nation."

the stereotypes about public and private schools are just that.

"As far as people go, I think we have the same type," Olson said. "At school, you have your outgoing people, your shy people and your sports people. It's a matter that we only have 35."

Lane said although she never was exposed to private schools, she was familiar with the stereotypes.

"I always heard the stereotypes that they were really rich and snobby," Lane said. "There's also the stereotype that public school students behave worse and aren't as elite as opposed to private-school students. A lot of my friends came from the Catholic school, and neither stereotypes exist."

However, there are a lot of differences between the schools. Olson said a lot of her classes are combined. Junior and seniors, for example, will take the same literature class but have different assignments.

She also said there are fewer extracurricular activities. This is something that prompted Olson to think about transferring to a public school.

She's played basketball for six years and volleyball for four, but wants to play softball as well — something that's not offered at her school.

Olson said being at a private school has its drawbacks.

"When I get out in large groups, it's a little hard for me to interact," she said. "It would be nice to get around new people."

Lane said her high school's main drawback is the scheduling — she's had a different schedule all four years of high school.

Another thing she said she would like to change is the Board of Education and the administration at her school.

"I don't really think that they really consider what the students have to say," Lane said. "Students don't really have a voice at our school."

These two seniors also are exposed to different environments.

A typical weekend for Olson is watching a movie and going to Baskin Robbins afterwards. Other students at her school go to the K-State Student Union, either to bowl or play pool, she said.

Although she does hear about people using drugs or alcohol, Olson said it's not an issue.

Lane said there always are opportunities to party and drink, and although she chooses not to succumb to pressure, there are others who do.

"I definitely think drugs and alcohol are a really big part of what seniors do," Lane said. "There's a lack of recreational activity. A lot of seniors turn to that as something to do on the weekends. The pressure is definitely there for a lot of people."

This issue, however, is overshadowed by a bigger challenge: the university.

Olson applied to the Mid-America Nazarene University in Olathe, Kan., and Lane applied to K-State. The biggest adjustment for Olson is living away from home.

"It'll be a different life for me," she said. "The biggest challenge will be living in the dorms and getting used to being in a new town."

Lane said that was the reason she chose K-State.

"The fact that it was local — I don't want too many changes at once," she said. "The biggest change for me will be time-management skills."

"If I were to change one thing, I'd probably have started earlier with the scholarship application process. I was faced just now with the fact that I have no money," she said.

Both will be leaving behind their high school years, but they will continue with their activities. Olson wants to play sports at Mid-America, and Lane wants to pursue a journalism career.

"I've enjoyed it, and I'm anxious to get out at the same time," Olson said. "I'm looking forward to going to a university."

*Seriously.

I know that usually when you see an asterisk (like this * one) after the word free, it's not. But this is. We want to give you a free Macintosh iMac computer. All you have to do is come into our new branch to register for it.

Sure, we don't really want to just give it to you. When you come to register, we'll probably start with some small talk and then tell you about our Visa Check Card, or Internet Banking. And if we find out you're graduating in May, we'll tell you about a good way to get a new car to compliment that new job of yours.

So come register for this free Macintosh iMac computer at the new Commerce Bank branch on the south side of the Student Union's first floor. Besides a free Macintosh iMac computer, we'll have free refreshments and, as always, free checking.

Resolution concerning smoking to be introduced to Student Senate

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A resolution recommending the elimination of smoking in all work places and enclosed public buildings in the city of Manhattan will be introduced to Student Senate tonight.

Eleven student senators, led by Student Body President Jason Heinrich, will unveil the initiative calling for the Manhattan City Commission to take steps to adopt a city-wide ordinance prohibiting smoking in public places, including restaurants and bars.

The resolution states that smoking should be banned in public areas due to health concerns contributed to the dangers of tobacco and secondhand smoke.

Heinrich said because of the health concerns of secondhand smoke, such as lung cancer, heart disease and respiratory infection, he felt that Senate should address the issue.

"We're not trying to get rid of smoking," Heinrich said. "That would be impossible. But, a smoker's desire to smoke is infringing on another person's right to breathe fresh air."

Heinrich said he and the authors of the legislation have talked to community organizations, students and faculty about the issue and have done research on the health effects of smoking.

Since Manhattan City Commission hasn't pushed for a smoking ban in public places, Heinrich said the proposal is just a recommendation for the commission to recognize the problem.

The resolution has no legislative value.

"As far as policy, it doesn't mean anything," he said. "It just puts our name behind the issue. We have a good opportunity to take a leadership role. We can lead the state."

Heinrich said he wants the proposal to encourage city commission to take action.

"It's not our role to put forth specifics," he said. "We will support the city commission, and they will put forth the action. We are making the first steps for a push."

After the legislation is introduced, it must be debated and then voted on by Senate. Even if the proposal passes in Senate, it still has a long journey before it becomes a law.

Gail Urban, executive director of the Community Health Council, said the council would be supportive of Heinrich's proposal because it is a health issue. But the health council doesn't have a position on the issue yet.

"The Community Health Council has not formally said they would back this issue," Urban said. "It is premature at this point to say we are pushing for an ordinance for anti-smoking. We don't have a position yet. There's nothing to have a position on."

Urban said if the initiative gained student backing, then and only then would the council put it on the agenda.

"It needs student backing before it becomes a community issue," she said. "That's a big step. If they gain the support on campus, the council would support that initiative. As long as the community endorses it, so will we."

The Community Health Council, like

RESOLUTION: SECTION 1

The KSU Student Governing Association recommends that the Manhattan City Commission take steps to protect the public health and adopt a city-wide ordinance eliminating smoking in all workplaces and enclosed public buildings.

Senate, has no legislative powers when it comes to citywide ordinances.

Urban said that if the council decides to put the issue on its agenda, it would recommend that the issue be put on City Commission's agenda.

Extension cord probable cause of Aggieville fire

■ Fire damage to futon store initially estimated at $108,500.

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A short in an extension cord caused the fire at Wildcat Futons Plus on Tuesday afternoon, causing estimated damages of $108,500, authorities said.

"There was a light-duty extension cord that overheated. It probably ignited some of the adjacent materials," said Steve Burnett, assistant director of technical services for the Manhattan Fire Department.

Although no one was injured, the fire spread past the futon store, damaging two other stores in the area.

Lucky Mac's Liquor Store, 1100 Laramie St., and Mini Mart Convenience Grocery Store, 1102 Laramie St., both received smoke damage.

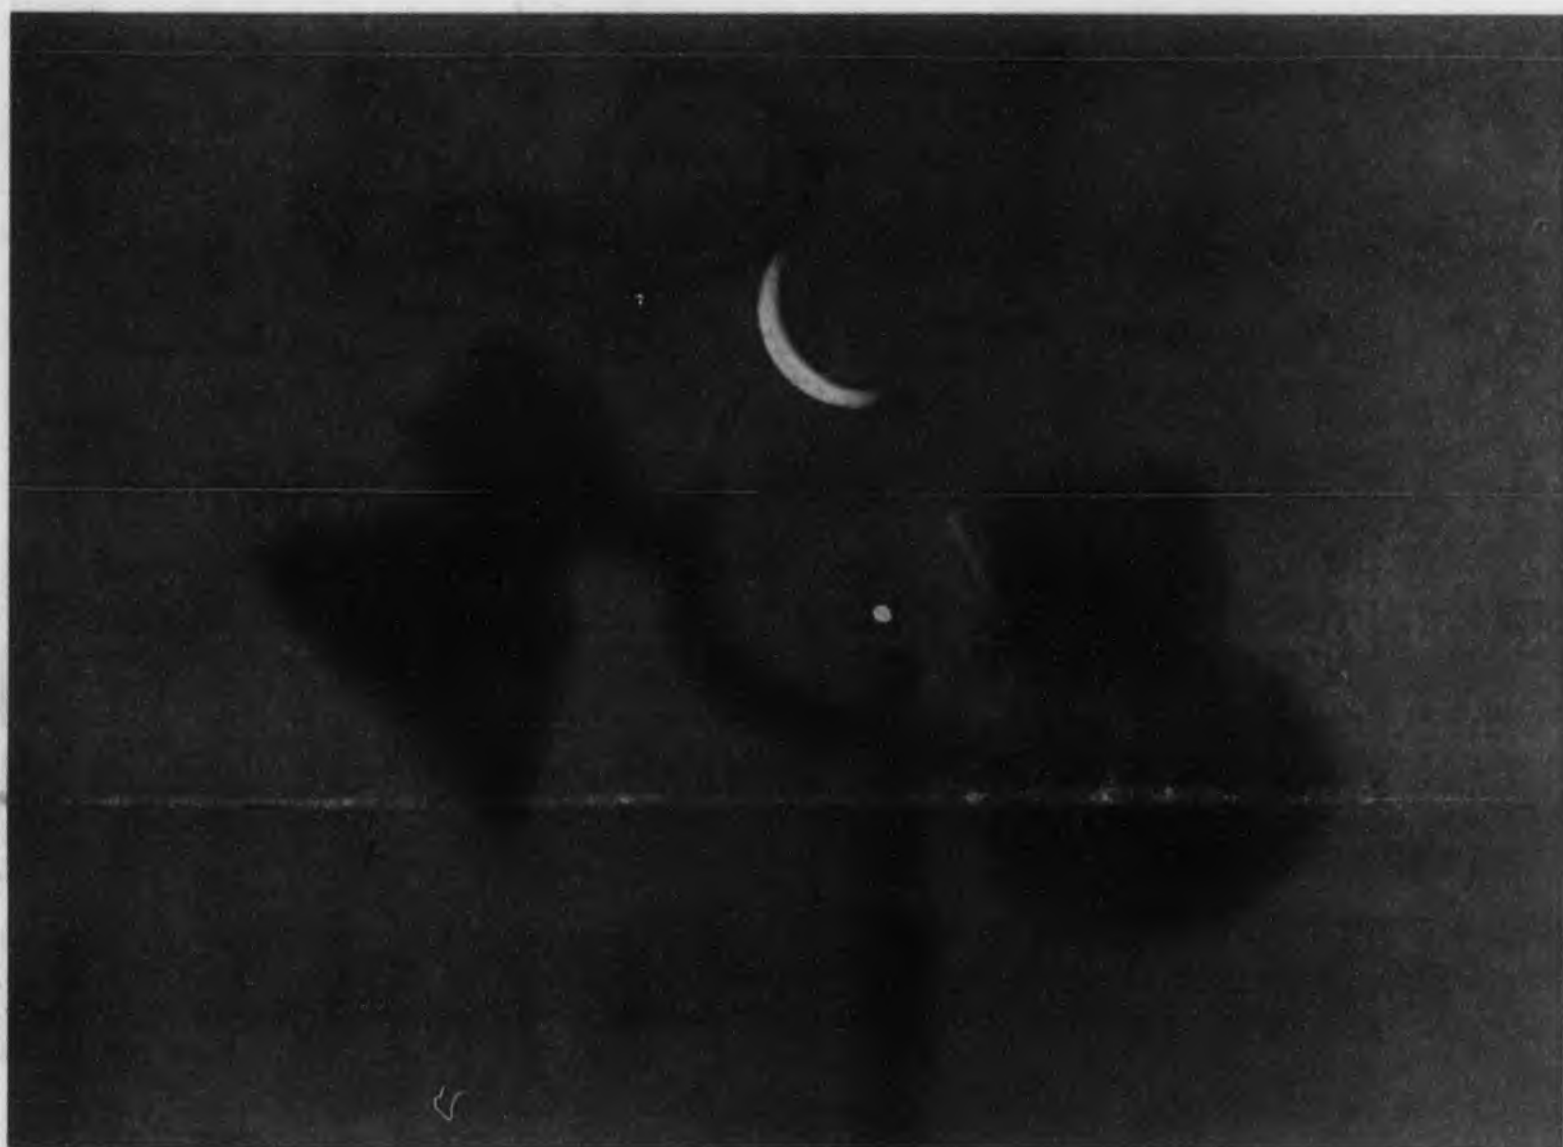

The smoke damage to Lucky Mac's is estimated to be around $2,000, and Mini Mart's is estimated at $3,000.

Kevan Proctor said the fire occurred when he and his daughter stepped out of the store to refill his coffee at Mini Mart.

Before the fire broke out, Proctor reported to the fire marshal that he had smelled something unusual in the store, like scorched wood.

The inspector was unable to determine the source of the smell.

It is unknown at this time if the smell was related to the fire or if there are plans to reopen the business.

Greek Affairs working to comply with ADA

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Disabled Student Services and Greek Affairs are working together to see how fraternities and sororities can be more compliant with the Americans with Disabilities Act.

Gretchen Holden, director of Disabled Student Services, said a woman confined to a wheelchair contacted her last summer about wanting to go through K-State's rush. However, it was decided that it would be difficult for the woman to go from house to house and get inside each house.

The woman decided not to go through regular rush; instead, she decided to rush a house that had its recruitment process after formal rush. Holden said she spent about a day with one of the alumnae of the house trying to figure out how to get the woman inside. They didn't know whether they should buy a ramp or rent a ramp. After coming to a temporary solution, the woman addressed more problems during interviews in the house.

Holden said many of the women who were helping rush were insensitive to the situation.

"They asked questions like, 'How would you keep up with the others if you went on a trip?'" she said.

Holden said this woman is one of two women on the K-State campus confined to wheelchairs who would love to be part of a sorority.

"Both girls are 4.0 students, both charming as all get-out and both with great leadership potential and both wishing they could rush," she said. "They would be an asset to any social group."

While the university is required by law to be ADA compliant, greek housing is considered separate from the university because it is of a private organization.

"On the other hand, I would argue that it's part of university life. We have a moral obligation and also maybe a legal one because we do house Greek Affairs, and we do provide forum for greeks during orientation," she said. "If we're going to have a greek system here, we have the responsibility to say, 'if you're going to have space on this campus and use orientation to recruit and use admissions to send out letters, then you have the responsibility to make sure all people are accessible.'"

Fraternities and sororities often are renovating their houses, and Holden said these organizations should consider ADA compliance while renovating.

Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said they are beginning to address this issue.

"As we looked at the state of the greek community, we recog-

Greek Affairs hasn't begun to look at what it would cost to make greek houses ADA compliant, but Robel said financial limitations for the houses could be a factor in whether they can become ADA compliant.

"But everyone is certainly willing to look at the issue," she said.

The Interfraternity Council and Panhellenic Council have had both Holden and Rep. Jeff Peterson, R-Manhattan, who is Cats' Den scheduled to open Feb 14, offer food, variety of school supplies

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Cats' Den is only weeks from opening, providing students with more food, beverage and school-supply options.

Cindie Snyder, marketing and promotions manager for the K-State Student Union, said the Cats' Den will tentatively open the week of Feb. 14. She said the expanded information counter will feature an enlargement of food choices such as candy and beverages, as well as sandwiches, fruit and microwavable foods for those who are on campus at night.

"There will be things there that will be handy for people in the Union who study late at night," Snyder said. "Things like last-minute supplies and a variety of food that's not candy will be available to students."

Snyder said the Cats' Den will be an estimated 1,000 square feet and will serve as a different kind of atmosphere not normally seen in the Union. The walls, floor and windows have been installed, but she said the final completion is hinging on the arrival of a custom-made curvatura ribbon ceiling from California.

"We invited the architect to let loose when he designed the store," Snyder said.

Snyder said the Cats' Den hours will mirror that of the Union's regular hours of operation. She said two doors, one leading out to the Union concourse and one leading in from the Union's north entrance, will be available to students allowing the store to remain open even if the Union is closed.

She also said that besides the larger food options, the Cats' Den will have school supplies, greeting cards, K-State novelties, computer disks magazines, newspapers and the film pickup and drop-off center.

"Because of the larger floor space, we are able to provide more options than before," Snyder said. "The Cats' Den will provide things that students will need after hours."

Kathy Yates, merchandise division manager for the K-State Union Bookstore, said the larger variety of food will include candy as well as grab-n-go snacks such as sandwiches and salads, nachos and Oscar Mayer hot dogs.

She said they are in the process of finalizing the product lines, at this time, but she said students will be pleased with the options.

"I think they are going to love the new store," Yates said. "It will be convenient for those who study in the Union, and many students usually want something more than candy to munch on at night."

Jill Snyder, sophomore in interior architecture, said she is in and out of the Union during most of the week because of its proximity to Seaton Hall.

She said the expanded variety of foods and services is a great idea for those who are in Seaton working on projects or studying in the Union.

"It is going to be very convenient for me, because I am always back and forth," Jill Snyder said. "It looks like it is going to be a big store, and because the bookstore has been closing early with the construction, the extended hours will be great."

As part of the grand opening ceremony and festivities, Cindie Snyder said Jenny Imhoff, graduate student in secondary education and winner of the naming contest, will be present to ring in the first sale. The name was picked from a pool of 246 entries by an ad hoc Union Governing Board naming committee in December.

Explosion. A man was arrested earlier this week in relation to an explosion that police believed was linked to a methamphetamine lab.

John Jacob Erbert, 19, was arrested on two counts of possession of a controlled substance and possession of drug paraphernalia.

The explosion, which occurred Jan. 25, was caused by a fire extinguisher containing anhydrous ammonia, a chemical fertilizer that can be used to produce methamphetamine.

A second extinguisher was found at the scene still intact. Further investigation is being conducted.

Trial starts in beating death of Emporia football player

EMPORIA, Kan. — Testimony from witnesses in a parking lot will show that three men beat up an Emporia State University football player unintentionally, but recklessly, a prosecutor told jurors Wednesday.

"For the first time, in public, in court, in the open, on the records," assistant attorney general Stephen Maxwell said in opening statements, "you'll hear the facts, not rumors, not speculation ... that caused us all to be here today and Brian Wagner to be dead."

Andrew Lloyd, 21; Kelly Maxfield, 22; and Rex Pendlay, 23, all of Emporia, are charged with unintentional second-degree murder in Wagner's death. The jury was picked Tuesday.

Wagner, 19, was a freshman from St. Paul, Kan., and played linebacker for the Hornets. He was one of at least seven people involved in a fight the morning of April 21, 1999, in a downtown Emporia parking lot. He suffered severe head injuries and did not regain consciousness. He died April 27 at Wesley Medical Center in Wichita.

Emporia police have said the fight started between two young women in the parking lot. Wagner and two friends arrived at the scene to support one of the women, and two men supporting the other woman arrived soon after.

The trial is scheduled to take at least two weeks. Prosecutors have subpoenaed 44 witnesses, including witnesses in the parking lot, law enforcement officers who investigated Wagner's death and medical personnel who treated him.

Madonna releases version of classic 'American Pie'

NEW YORK — Bye-bye, Miss American Pie. Hello, Madonna.

The Material Girl released her version of the 1971 classic "American Pie" to radio stations Tuesday, a truncated take on Don McLean's 8 1/2-minute rock 'n' roll homage to Buddy Holly, Ritchie Valens and the Big Bopper.

The song's debut came one day before the anniversary of "the day the music died": Feb. 3, 1959, when a plane carrying the three young rock stars went down in an Iowa cornfield.

Madonna's remake times out at under five minutes, a considerable cut from the original. And don't worry if you don't remember all the words: the Material Girl has trimmed some of the verses.

That's blasphemy to a generation that grew up singing along with McLean's hodgepodge of images and scenes.

Madonna's version strays far afield from McLean's simple arrangement. There's an electronic dance beat, and distant background vocals from actor Rupert Everett.

There also is an explosion of interest from adult contemporary and Top 40 radio stations, which have jumped to add the song to their playlists, said Heidi Ellen Robinson, spokesman for Madonna's label, Maverick.

The song is from the soundtrack to Madonna's latest movie, "The Next Best Thing," which co-stars Everett. The movie opens March 3, while the soundtrack, in perfect marketing style, arrives in stores Feb. 22.

The 1971 McLean classic recently was ranked as the 19th best rock song ever by VH1.

The Madonna version didn't receive such a ringing endorsement from Newsday writer Isaac Guzman, who described it as an almost syrupy, slick take on McLean's original.

The radio release was the first chance for the public to hear the new version. Madonna originally was scheduled to perform the song at the Super Bowl, but pulled out.

House considering proposal to cut drug costs for seniors

TOPEKA — Fifty House members, led by Rep. Carlos Mayans, are sponsoring a bill that would create a program to help pay for prescription drugs for senior citizens.

The bill would provide up to $1,500 in benefits for poor senior citizens each year. Seniors would only have to pay $12 per prescription.

"Senior citizens are being bankrupted by prescription costs," Mayans, R-Wichita, said. "Some Kansans are having to choose between taking their medicine and buying food for the dinner table."

Under the bill, the state would use money from its share of a national settlement of lawsuits against tobacco companies to finance the new program. Mayans estimates the program would cost $5 million a year.

The program would be for Kansans 62 and older. They would be eligible if their household incomes were less than $16,000, or as individuals they had incomes of less than $14,000.

The bill was introduced Wednesday in the House.

Save Gumby's coupons for March 1

By CHRISTIE VANOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coupons are out. Deals are hot. Nobody's home.

In the old Wildcat Waterbeds & Futons Too location at the corner of 11th and Moro streets, the only sign of a pizza restaurant is the sign out front.

There are no ovens, no people and no pizzas.

Since the semester began, Aggieville's newest attraction, Gumby's Pizza, has been running coupons.

"The coupon book was done in November," owner Doug Macejewski said. "We had to sign an agreement in November, because the book goes through the whole spring. So, it's either get in now and let people know we're here and be open in the beginning of March, or not be in it. I'd rather be in it."

It seems Manhattan is ready for the anticipated March 1 opening day, said Chris Dineno, Gumby's Pizza project development manager.

"Just in the last hour, I've had about 10 people call in to place an order," Dineno said.

Co-founder Chance Hippler said he promises Gumby's Pizza will be worth the wait.

Hippler and Jeff O'Brien started Gumby's Pizza 14 years ago in Gainesville, Fla., at the University of Florida. Since then, they have opened up 22 stores in college towns. Their Lawrence store has been open for nearly nine years.

"A lot of our stores are just carry-out units, because that's what we started out with," Hippler said. "Then we suddenly got into a mini sports bar kind of place."

Hippler said even though the restaurant seems to be a dine-in establishment, the original niche was for delivery. He said the Manhattan site would focus on both, similar to their Athens, Ga., store.

"Even though we have the dine-in and the pool table and the whole nine yards, we're going to still have 6 to 10 drivers on every night, and we still go for the 30-minute delivery service," he said. "Our first 11-12 years of business were delivery only, so we've become experts in doing that."

Manhattan's Gumby's Pizza will serve draft beer, wine and bottles along with their famous "Big Ass" 20-inch pizza and

EVAN SEMON/COLLEGIAN

When the pizza restaurant opens, Gumby's will be open late and will deliver 11 a.m.-2 a.m. Sunday, 11 a.m.-2:30 a.m. Monday through Wednesday and 11 a.m.-3:30 a.m. Thursday through Saturday.

Pokey Stix.

"Pokey Stix will take the town by storm, just as they have every other town we're in," Hippler said. "It's at least 50 percent of our business."

Gumby's Pizza will be open late and will deliver 11 a.m. to 2 a.m. Sunday; 11 a.m. to 2:30 a.m. Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday; and 11 a.m. to 3:30 a.m. Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

"One thing that makes us a little bit different than most pizza places is that we deliver a wide variety of menu items like, subs, salads, calzones and pizza," Macejewski said. "You can even get a 12-inch chicken Parmesan, and we'll deliver it."

They also plan to have occasional bands, a jukebox, pool tables, an outside deck and televisions for K-State games and other sporting events.

"We've got attitude," Dineno said. "That's what makes us different."

Free student visits to Lafene Health Center eventually might be a thing of the past. Lafene's annual budget of $4.2 million no longer can keep up with the rising costs of providing health care for this campus.

"It comes down to revenue not keeping up with costs," Lannie Zweimiller, Lafene director, said. "We will be looking into alternative ways of funding so we can provide the services."

The Student Privilege Fee Committee manages privilege fees annually and applies the money to student services such as Student Publications Inc., the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, the Fine Arts Council, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, KSDB-FM 91.9, the Union Program Council, the Office of Student Activities and University Counseling Services. This money is the result of the $251 privilege fee paid by each K-State student per semester.

One-third of the $8.5 million generated by student privilege fees goes to Lafene. The center operates both on the privilege fee fund and the revenue generated by usage charges to patients for things such as x-rays and prescriptions. Together, these funds add up to $4.2 million, a sum that cannot meet costs, Zweimiller said.

As of now, students do not pay for office visits to Lafene, but the institution of an office visit fee is a possibility, Zweimiller said.

Brooke Taylor, freshman in technology, spent her fair share of time at Lafene this fall and said she does not mind the idea of paying for office visits.

"I was shocked to discover that Lafene offered free office visits to begin with," Taylor said. "Compared to what you pay an off-campus doctor, a small charge sounds reasonable and is still the better deal in terms of health care options."

Besides charging patients a nominal visit fee, other alternatives include giving students three free visits and charging for a fourth, or even raising the student privilege fee, said Ryan Walker, privilege fee chair and sophomore in family studies and human services. However, the privilege fee has not increased in the last two years.

"Nothing is set in stone," Walker said. "We are beginning to talk about it, but an official presentation has not yet been made to the committee. We want to make sure students get health care at K-State. Although raising the privilege fee is an option, it's not necessarily what's best for the students."

Lack of funds is not just a local problem. In fact, the health centers at most Big 12 schools also face budgetary woes.

"In the Big 12, the University of Oklahoma and Oklahoma State University currently charge students for office visits [on top of privilege fees]," Zweimiller said. "But a lot of schools are facing the same dilemma in how to finance their services and also meet costs."

The privilege fee committee plans to meet with Zweimiller and the Student Health Advisory Committee later this month, Walker said. He said he is confident the three parties will find a solution that will serve the students best.

First Mentors matches students with local children

By NEAL MANGELS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The First Mentors program, offered by Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc. gives K-State students the opportunity to become a mentor to an area child without committing a lot of time.

The program is a partnership between First USA and Big Brothers Big Sisters of America Inc. Its goal is to match college students with children in need of a positive role model.

Valerie Lundy, First Mentors coordinator, said the First Mentors program is a good opportunity for students to get involved in the community even if they don't have a lot of extra time.

First Mentors is a semester-long program with events usually once or twice a month.

"Everything that we do will be on campus," Lundy said. "The events are all scheduled, and they will be on Saturdays, late in the morning."

Lundy said events will help the children and the mentors get to know each other and will include activities such as scavenger hunts and bowling.

Jeremy Hollowell, senior in operations management, is involved with the traditional Big Brothers-Big Sisters program. Hollowell said he usually spends about three hours a week with the children.

"We do stuff like going to the arcade at the mall or go to the zoo or play catch if it's nice," Hollowell said. "It's a lot of fun."

Manhattan has more than 50 children on the waiting list for the Big Brothers-Big Sisters core program. First Mentors is a program for them.

"It gets the 'littles' involved in the program until they get matched with a mentor in the core program," Lundy said.

A Big Brothers-Big Sisters study found that children who met with a mentor about three times a month for at least a year did better at school and home and avoided substance abuse and violence.

Hollowell said he encourages others to get involved.

"It helps train you for taking care of kids," Hollowell said. "The kids really enjoy it, and I have a good time with them."

Lundy said she is hopeful students will be interested in the program.

"We have already had some 'littles' interested, and a few student volunteers show some interest," Lundy said.

Applications to participate in the program are due Feb. 16. Applications are available in the residence halls or at the Office of Student Activities and Services in the K-State Student Union.

Student Senate should not support smoking ban

The resolution in Student Senate calling for a citywide ordinance prohibiting smoking in work places and enclosed areas — such as bars and restaurants — should be dropped like a bad habit.

If passed, the resolution officially would express Senate support for such an ordinance, but would not be legally binding. But Senate should not be jonesing to jump on the bandwagon anytime soon.

While smoking is not the most enviable of habits, it should not be banned from all of the city's enclosed areas — specifically bars.

Certainly restaurants and other family-oriented establishments should be urged to ban smoking on their own, but a citywide ban is too broad.

Rather than infringe on smokers' rights by kicking them out of every business in town, Senate should consider a resolution that would encourage restaurants and bars to go smoke-free voluntarily. This leaves the decision up to the owners and would allow smokers and non-smokers to migrate to the businesses that best suit their needs.

Jason Heinrich, student body president, is pushing this plan with evidence that shows how well smoking bans have worked in California. However, not everything that works for California works for Kansas, and Heinrich should realize this.

He claims he is willing to fight for the resolution because it is something he cares about. But opposition will be tough.

If he truly is concerned about the problem, Heinrich would be better off using his energy to persuade individual establishment owners to change their policies instead of trying to garner support for a resolution so broad it is destined to fail.

In the meantime, Senate should drop the plan — cold turkey.

A Modest Parking Proposal

The following is a clear, concise, reasonable and logical solution to the parking problem on campus. If implemented, it not only will be cost-free; the school will spend less money than it is now under the current state of affairs.

From the day this school was founded in 1863 by the Morrill Act, faculty, staff and students have been complaining about the lack of spaces to park one's car (or in the early times; to hitch one's horse). During the 1960s — while other college students were having sit-ins to protest the war in Vietnam — students at K-State were sitting in their cars behind Waters Hall waiting for somebody to pull out of a parking space.

For the longest time I never believed there was a parking problem at K-State — only a laziness problem. Sure, if you didn't get to school by 7:50 a.m., you would not be able to find that choice parking space next to your seat in your first class, but there was always some place to park on campus.

There has been no time of day or night that I could not find at least some place to leave my vehicle. There always was parking behind Weber Hall. So it takes eight minutes to walk to the center of campus instead of two; all you lard-butts could use the exercise anyway. The truth is, K-State has better parking than most other universities.

This was my conviction. That was, up until this past fall semester.

At the start of the semester in fall 1999, when every single parking space behind Weber Hall was occupied by 8:30 a.m., I assumed it was the first week of school and people had not yet been skipping or dropping out of their first classes. I also thought this the second week of school and the third. By the time November came around and I tried to come into my lab Thanksgiving Day and I had to park three miles beyond where I live because there still was no parking on campus, I finally concluded an intolerable situation was at hand.

This onerous plight of the commuter is a result of steady increases in enrollment caused by the fantastic football seasons K-State has posted over the past several years, particularly during fall 1998. Through absolute brilliance, President Jon Wefald hired Coach Bill Snyder, one of the most adroit football coaches ever to grace the NCAA.

The correlation is direct — the more games in which the football team is victorious, the more enrollment increases, and the more enrollment increases, the less available spaces there are in which to park.

The solution is obvious: fire Snyder. There was no actual (although perhaps imagined) parking problem when the football team sucked, and there will be no actual parking problem when the team sucks once again.

It also should not be forgotten that it was under the stewardship of Wefald that Snyder was hired (along with the many other academic improvements imposed upon the university). Thus, in case he screws up and hires another incredibly gifted football coach and/or turns K-State into one of the most illustrious institutions of scholarship, Wefald also should get the sack.

It also has been brought to my attention that K-State's forensics and meat judging teams also are nationally ranked near the top. To be safe, it also will be necessary to dismiss the coaches of these teams.

Once Snyder is gone, the school will need to hire someone new to coach the football team. At first, I thought K-State could hire Coach Terry Allen from the University of Kansas. Since he does a pretty crappy job in Lawrence, there is a good probability he will do a crappy job here, too. However, he does know something about football, and in combination with the program left by Snyder, he still might win games (at least for a while).

So, the school needs to hire someone proven to be of questionable intelligence. I suggest the person in charge of watering the grounds during the months of sweltering weather. Any 10-year-old knows that if one waters the grass when the weather is oppressively hot, one does it at night when the majority of water will not evaporate. Thus, the obvious choice for football coach would be the head groundskeeper. If anything, being football coach will keep this person from cutting down any more trees about campus.

If this plan is implemented, not only will adequate parking abound, but the university actually will save roughly $1 million — the combined salaries of Snyder and Wefald ($1,060,000 if you add in the forensic and meat judging team coaches).

With this extra dough, the school can build that outdoor swimming pool with twin water slides for those of us who are stuck here during the summer.

If all else fails and there still is not enough parking, we can take all that empty space in Hale Library where books ought to be and turn this area into the new parking garage.

Campaign-finance reform should be primary issue

Before the primaries began, an issue on many minds in Washington, D.C., was campaign finance reform.

The idea of campaign reform was not welcome by any means. In fact, those who stood for reform were ostracized politically. Senator, and now Republican presidential nominee hopeful, John McCain, was hailed by the media and scorned by those in power.

Now that the primaries are underway, the issue rests on the back burner. But corruption still could be very visible.

Republican Texas Gov. George Bush announced he raised $11 million during the past three months of 1999, bringing his total to a record $68.7 million and continuing to swamp the rest of the presidential field.

Bradley has raised $27 million for his campaign. Gore has raised $28.2 million, while McCain brings in the rear, having only raised $7.7 million.

All of this money is legitimate hard money.

Clearly, the candidates are capable of raising sufficient funds to conduct a healthy campaign through regulated donations and federal matching contributions.

The cancer of campaign finance, and the potential focus of reform, is soft-money contributions.

Soft money is money contributed by corporations and individuals to parties for party-building activities. Unlike hard money, which is money contributed by individuals, limited to $1,000 per candidate, per election, soft money is completely unregulated and extremely hard to track.

Since 1907, it has been illegal for corporations to spend money in connection with federal elections. The myth of soft money is that it is contributed and spent for euphemistic party-building purposes that are unrelated to influencing federal elections. But this premise is little more than a widely acknowledged legal fiction that should not be taken seriously.

Soft money corrupts for a simple and obvious reason. Soft-money donations are given in such huge amounts — $150,000, $200,000 or more — that the donors typically expect to receive something in return for their investment.

One of the most likely to be blamed for accepting soft-money contributions is Bush, whose finance officials deny that they have begun to raise soft money or that they have begun to discuss how to do it.

But it is widely known that Bush opposes McCain's proposal to ban unlimited contributions to political parties.

Some Republicans have estimated that if Bush is the nominee, the Republican Party easily could easily raise $250 million in soft money, more than twice the amount raised in the 1996 election.

If this plays out, as many political scientists believe, Bush will be extremely sensitive to the subject because he has been criticized by Republican rivals as the big-money candidate, beholden to special interests.

Essentially, that is the crux of the reform issue. Our candidates should not be beholden to anyone but the voting public. No special priority should be given to those with more money or political clout.

But I live in Kansas, a place many non-residents believe to be the land of Oz. As far as the people in the beltway think, my small savings account and idealistic views belong somewhere over the rainbow.

Senate approves minimum-wage boost; partisan battles ahead

By ALAN FRAM
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Teeing up for an election-year fight, the Senate approved a Republican bill Wednesday that would boost the minimum wage by $1 an hour over three years, a period of time President Clinton and Democrats say is too long to wait.

With many Republicans — especially in the House — eager to avoid repeated campaign-season attacks on the widely popular issue, some increase in the current $5.15 hourly minimum seems likely to become law before Election Day.

But with the White House and Democrats also objecting to the measure's $18 billion in tax cuts over five years — mostly for small business owners — it is unclear what the final version will look like. The GOP's desire to avoid making the proposal a campaign issue gives Democrats little incentive to quickly settle for anything less than what they want: a two-year phase-in, with a much smaller tax package.

"That's not the kind of legislation the president can sign," said White House spokesman Joe Lockhart, citing its three-year phase-in and a bevy of unpaid-for tax cuts for the special interests.

The minimum wage boost was included in a bill that would overhaul the nation's bankruptcy laws that the Senate approved by 83-14.

The House approved its own version of the bankruptcy legislation last May, but it lacked any minimum wage provisions.

Last November, the House Ways and Means Committee approved a separate GOP bill that would increase the minimum wage by $1 over three years and includes a $30 billion, five-year package of tax cuts. Some $16 billion of that price tag is a reduction in the estate tax paid by upper-income people who inherit substantial assets.

But the fate of the House legislation is unclear. So far, with defections likely by moderate Republicans from urban, northeastern districts, GOP leaders lack the votes to move their version of the bill through the House. They hope to have a vote on the issue by late March and are insistent on including tax reductions they say will offset businesses' costs of paying the higher wages.

"I hate it," House Majority Whip Tom DeLay, R-Texas, said Tuesday when asked about the minimum wage increase. "Obviously, we don't have the votes to stop minimum wage, so we ought to do something that lessens the burden on people that pay the wages."

About 11 million Americans are paid the minimum wage. About half are less than 24 years old, and many have part-time jobs.

But more important to the politics of the issue is the proposal's popular appeal. In a poll taken last spring for the Wall Street Journal and NBC News, three-fourths of those questioned favored the $1-an-hour increase.

The potency of the minimum wage as a campaign issue was last illustrated in 1996, another campaign year. After initial opposition by many Republicans, Congress finally voted to raise the wage from $4.25 to its current $5.15 in two steps.

This year's Senate bill would increase the wage by 35 cents an hour in March 2000, by 35 cents more in March 2001 and 30 cents in March 2002.

The language was added to the bankruptcy bill last November, after Democrats tried — and failed — to force their own version into the legislation. The Democratic alternative would have raised the minimum wage by $1 with two 50-cent increases over 13 months, while also providing $9.6 billion in tax relief and raising other taxes.

In a dispute the two parties have fought for decades, Democrats argue that with many Americans flush from the booming economy, the time is ripe to raise the minimum wage.

They note that as is, it pays $10,700 a year for 52 40-hour weeks — $3,200 below the poverty line for a family of three. They also say the difference between their version and the GOP language would cost each minimum wage earner $1,200.

"The watered-down wage proposal in this bill is an insult to hard-working men and women," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., sponsor of the Democratic proposal.

GOP lawmakers argue that raising the minimum wage would help low-income families by less than meets the eye because many recipients are teenagers, not parents of low-income families.

They also say businesses could eliminate up to 500,000 jobs, rather than increase minimum salaries.

"How do we get passed a very defensible bill that would not increase the number of unemployed as dramatically as Kennedy's amendment would do?" is how Senate Majority Whip Don Nickles, R-Okla., described the GOP's task. "Tax relief is an important component of that."

The Senate GOP bill includes health insurance deduction for workers who lack employer-provided coverage and an immediate 100 percent deduction for the self-employed. It also would raise the business meal deduction from 50 percent to 80 percent and make pension rules more generous for many business owners and higher-paid workers.

Recruits sign letters of intent; football program takes 18

Big 12 schools begin recruiting; Texas highest ranked in polls

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State football program added 18 new players to its roster Wednesday, the first day recruits officially could sign letters of intent.

Included in the class are six community-college transfers and 12 high school players. The Wildcats added no players originally from Kansas, but two of the community-college transfers played college football in the state.

In a statement released Wednesday night, head coach Bill Snyder said it is too early to discuss the effect the recruits will make.

"As is always the case, the strength of this or any recruiting class will not be determined until we have had these young men in our program for a couple of years. We do, however, appreciate the quality of character of this class, as well as their collective desire to succeed in the classroom, as well as on the football field," Snyder said.

On the offensive side of the ball, the class includes four linemen, two tight ends, one running back, one quarterback and one wide receiver. On defense, the Cats signed four linemen, two linebackers, two defensive backs and one punter/kicker.

With recent departures from the team, K-State's scholarship total with the newly signed players should be close to the NCAA limit of 85.

According to Rivals100.com, Michael Menifee, a defensive back from Houston is known to be interested in signing with the Wildcats, but did not Wednesday because of uncertainty about whether he will qualify academically to

*At press time, Rivals 100.com ranked the K-State class 40th in the country

CHELSEA SCHMIDT/COLLEGIAN

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Feb. 2 is a big day in the college football world.

Football programs around the country signed players to letters of intent, and Wednesday was the first day a player was eligible to sign. K-State football signed a variety of football players Wednesday, but they will not have an official press conference until today.

The following are highlights from schools around the Big 12, and a look at the bigger picture.

According to a Rivals100.com Web site, the Big 12 had five of its 12 teams in the top 25 recruiting wise. The Web site uses a formula to figure out the overall strength of a class.

Texas

Texas was the highest ranked Big 12 school in national polls, and it ranked No. 5. It had four parade All-Americans in the class. The school also had 10 USA Today all-Americans and 18 all-state performers.

The team did not sign any community college players, but it does have two players who are eligible for spring drills.

Nebraska

Nebraska entered the day tabbed the No. 7 school in America by Rivals100.com. The school signed 21 players and only one community-college freshman.

Nine of the Cornhuskers were recruited to play defense, and 11 on offense. Of the team's 21 recruits, 13, according to the Nebraska sports information release, had All-American designations.

Oklahoma

The Sooners signed 23 players from the high school ranks and five community-college transfers. Oklahoma recruited 12 players for the offensive side of the football, and it signed two players from Kansas community colleges. The team was ranked 14th nationally.

Colorado

Head coach Gary Barnett and Colorado Buffaloes entered the day ranked 19th by Rivals100.com, and they signed 23 players to letters of intent. The Buffaloes recruited eight players from the state of Colorado, and they signed 11 players each for both sides of the football.

Texas A&M

R.C. Slocumb announced the signing of 22 players to the squad, and of those, 20 were from Kansas. The Aggies signed 12 defensive players, and they addressed some needs on special teams by signing a kicker and a punter.

Kansas

The Jayhawks ranked 31st entering the day. They signed 27 players to play next season, and of those, 11 will emerge from the community college level.

KU also signed 11 players with affiliations in the state of Texas to letters of intent.

Oklahoma State

The Cowboys signed 29 players to the team. On the offensive side, they signed 14 players. They also signed several players who are designated as athletes, and their positions have yet to be determined.

Missouri

Larry Smith's recruiting class was ranked 45th. The Tigers recruited 28 players in this year's class and 16 will play on the offensive side of the football.

Iowa State

The Cyclones were ranked No. 58 in recruiting entering the day. The team inked 25 players to commitments, and eight of those were from community colleges. The Cyclones got an equal amount of help on both sides of the ball signing 12 offensive and defensive players for each side.

Baylor

The Bears where touted as the 59th school entering the day. They went on to sign 24 players, and 11 will play on the offensive side of the football.

Texas Tech

The Red Raiders had a conference-low ranking of 68. The Red Raiders signed 20 players for next season. Twelve of those players were recruited to play offense, and the other eight will play defense.

All rankings entering the day were done by Rivals100.com.

AMES, Iowa — Iowa State survived the inevitable letdown after beating Kansas, at K-State's expense.

Marcus Fizer scored 18 of his 28 points in the first half, and Kantrill Horton made four 3-pointers as the 20th-ranked Cyclones beat K-State 85-67 Wednesday night.

Playing its first game as a ranked team in nearly three years, Iowa State (19-3, 7-1 Big 12) started slowly but eventually got rolling, first with its transition game, then with its three-point shooting.

"We struggled at times," said Iowa State coach Larry Eustachy, whose team upset Kansas on Saturday. "It's just a letdown. I don't know if that's the word, but it's better than anything I could come up with. We anticipated a very difficult game, and at times it was."

Fizer put it more succinctly. "If we keep playing like this, we'll get Ls," he said.

Still, Iowa State was in no danger of losing once it began pulling away in the first half.

The Cyclones, with their best record ever after 22 games, led by 22 points in the second half, and it took four late three-pointers to keep K-State (8-11, 1-7) from getting blown away completely.

"Sitting in the locker room as coaches it was like we lost," Eustachy said. "I said, 'come on guys, this didn't happen much last year. Let's look at the bright side. We won. We're 7-1. It's kind of nice to be there.'"

K-State has lost seven straight, its longest losing streak since dropping 10 in a row in the 1996-97 season.

"We beat ourselves with turnovers and fouls," said Cortez Groves, who led K-State with 18 points. "Fizer is a great player, and Iowa State has good guards. That was the difference."

K-State did get the lead down to 75-64 on Groves' three-pointer with 3:51 left, but Fizer scored four points and Nurse five in a 9-2 run that finished off the Wildcats.

Fizer hit 11 of 22 shots in matching his season high and pulled down 11 rebounds.

"That's the best game Marcus Fizer has ever played against us, without a doubt,"

— Tom Asbury, K-State men's basketball coach

Horton finished with 17 points, and Iowa State got a courageous performance from Nurse, who was hospitalized with a 103-degree temperature on Tuesday. He scored 16 points, including three three-pointers.

"His stock, and it was awfully high, just doubled in my mind," Eustachy said. "I told him I've never been more proud of a guy. He really sucked it up. A lot of guys would have been in street clothes."

Kelvin Howell added 12 points for K-State and Josh Kimm 11.

Both teams struggled early. It was 5-5 after five minutes, and then Horton hit a three-pointer that ignited the Cyclones.

Iowa State built the lead to 20-10, only to see K-State cut it to 20-17 on Howell's tip-in. Iowa

Women soccer salaries rise; fans flock to games

Joining the ranks of professional athletes everywhere who go on strike to make more money, the U.S.

The athletes return to the field Sunday for an exhibition match against Norway after reaching an agreement with the U.S. Soccer Federation that raised players' salaries from $3,150 to $5,000.

The women missed three games before agreeing to a five-year contract with the USSF that provides the women, who won the World Cup, with the same salary as the U.S. men's team, who placed last in the World Cup.

While it's a shame that it's taken this long and this much success before the team garnered the same wages as the men, they didn't stop with just that. They still wanted more — and they got it.

The team, approaching the 2000 Olympics in Sydney, Australia, will split a $100,000 bonus for reaching the semifinals, $150,000 more for the bronze medal, $300,000 more for the silver medal and $700,000 more for the gold medal, as well as provisions for tours after the Olympics, all from the USFF.

The players also claim part-ownership of the soon to be U.S. women's soccer league. This will be the first major sports league in the United States to allow players to be part-owners.

Plans for the league, which should begin in April 2001, are under way, with various organizations bidding for control.

The problem, however, is that once the women form a national league, they no longer will be guaranteed the agreed salary. While one clause in the contract provides the women with game-appearance money and bonuses equal to the men's team, this seems hardly sufficient considering the difference in money generated by each team. People flock to the women's games, and people hardly know when the men's games take place.

But then, that's what the boycott was about to begin with, and the team did take significant strides, at least with the USSF.

FIFA, soccer's international governing body, paid USSF $800,000 for each game the men's team played in the 1998 World Cup. But it didn't pay any money for any women's game.

While it's easy to judge or criticize professional athletes who simply want more money, it certainly seems that this case demanded such action. In fact, it would be out of character for this team to accept these salary discrepancies from the Dark Ages.

These women are paving the way for many generations to come, and they seem to know that — even enjoy knowing that. Michelle Akers, who is famous for her determination on the soccer field as she battled with chronic fatigue syndrome, didn't stop this battle at USSF negotiations. No, she went to the president of the United States.

Akers joined President Clinton in the unveiling of a $27 million

New NCAA rules change eligibility requirements

By STEVE HERMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

INDIANAPOLIS — High school athletes now will have an easier time meeting academic standards that allow them to play college sports.

A new set of NCAA rules will let high schools determine whether athletes have fulfilled course requirements for college eligibility.

The decision means that many athletes who had been denied scholarships in the past now will be able to qualify for them.

A committee of the governing body recommended the change last spring, and the NCAA Division I and II membership recently approved the legislation.

The NCAA eliminated certain parts of the course requirements, giving high school principals more latitude in setting the agenda. The change takes effect immediately.

The old rules were much more stringent and allowed the NCAA to determine what were acceptable courses. For example, one previous regulation disqualified social studies courses that devoted more than 25 percent of classroom time to current affairs or independent study.

"We've become more generic in defining those academic criteria," Bob Oliver, director of NCAA membership services, to attend K-State.

K-State has a press conference scheduled for 1 p.m. today to discuss the signings further.

Snyder also said in the release that he wants these players to be complete players.

"We hope this class, although small in numbers, will follow in the footsteps of the 26 members of next year's senior class," Snyder said, "24 of which are on track to graduate in December or the following May."

Snyder said the team has not finished molding next year's roster yet.

"We are in the process of enhancing the incoming class with the addition of several walk-ons," Snyder said.

"Over the past 11 years, more than 55 walk-ons have earned scholarships and contributed a great deal to this program."

State then got its running game going and took off on a 21-7 run to take control.

The Cyclones scored three baskets in transition, two by Fizer, in an 8-0 burst. Then Horton hit a three-pointer, and Nurse sank two as the Cyclones built a 41-24 lead. It was 45-29 at halftime.

Horton's three-point play capped a 9-0 run that gave Iowa State its biggest lead, 68-46 with 8:28 left.

"I think Larry's done a great job with that group," Asbury said. "He's obviously a candidate for Big 12 coach of the year, maybe national coach of the year, the way he's got that group playing. They're hard-nosed, tough kids."

proposal to help women earn equal wages for the same work. While this might be little more than political show on President Clinton's part, the fact remains that Akers took the adversity she and her teammates faced and presented it as an example to powerful political leaders and the United States as a whole.

In 2000, Akers reminded the president and the rest of the United States that legislation was passed in the 1960s supposedly ensuring women equal pay.

She used her fame to advocate change in a relevant issue. Imagine what the world would be like if all professional athletes did the same, or at least earned coverage for their positive contributions to society.

Jaded sports fans everywhere can take a breath of fresh air as the U.S. Women's National Soccer Team fights for what is due. The world's been waiting for leaders like this.

The world also can watch these leaders at work on Sunday, as Akers plays what might be her final international appearance in Florida and the team of World Cup champions plays under coach April Heinrichs for the first time.

Soon, too, fans can watch an entire league of women athletes, beginning with eight teams next spring.

This, of course, will be after the Sydney Olympics and more publicity for the women's team.

The team, in fighting for equal or better pay for doing a significantly better job, has spurred action and discussion around the nation and a new league for professional women's athletes. And they're not even finished, yet.

said Wednesday.

The new rules require several things: The courses must be considered college preparatory, be taught at or above the high school's regular academic level and qualify for graduation credit in English, math, natural or physical science, social science, foreign language, computer science or nondiscriminatory religion or philosophy.

Independent study, individual instruction and correspondence and Internet courses now can be part of the new criteria for core subjects.

Oliver said the changes came about after two years of discussions.

"In areas of science and English, for example, they do a lot of interdisciplinary work," he said. "We're saying, if you give a course in English credit at your high school, and that's preparing the student for a four-year college, then that's meeting the intent of what we're trying to do."

He said the intent is to prepare students to succeed in college.

"Not are they able to use a computer to edit their term paper, but are they prepared to write a term paper?" he said.

Oliver said the NCAA in most cases will accept a principal's certification that a course satisfies requirements.

"The only time we'll investigate is if they send in a course titled 'woodworking' or 'drivers' ed' or 'phys ed' or 'remedial reading,' he said.

"That would throw up a red flag," he said.

"Maybe those are gross exaggerations of what might come in, but in the instructions we have sent to high schools, we clarify the NCAA has the authority to ask about a course whose title is off in left field."

CULT AWARENESS

The KSU Committee on Religion is concerned about KSU persons getting involved in cult-like and intense religious groups in our community. These groups often impair healthy growth educationally and emotionally. Harmful effects and methods of these groups include:

Deception - They often do not reveal name and affiliation in recruiting. High pressure practices.

Pressure and Guilt - Threats to disclose personal information if not attending meetings. Determine dating and marriage, daily schedules.

Total obedience - to the group and leaders to the exclusion of others. Family often seen as satanic influences. Often results in broken families and academic impairment.

Control - of lifestyle, monitoring all activities including food, money, sleep, and thinking. One on one monitoring making it hard to say no or leave the group.

May violate the KSU Religious Guidelines found in the University Phone Directory, Student Life Handbook, p. 62

The Committee on Religion offers these suggestions to University persons:

1. If you are invited to a meeting or Bible Study, ask for the name of the of the group and their affiliation.
2. If you are pressured about coming to a meeting or for your phone number say "no". Walk away. Report such incidents to staff or campus pastor.
3. Learn to question and think. If they claim to be the only true religion consult with your campus minister.
4. Be concerned about any group that pressures to control your behavior: money, dating, meetings. Be your own person. Make your own decisions.
5. If you are faced with a crisis, difficult decision, loss or loneliness, reach out to someone you know well - friend, parent, pastor, staff, counselor - someone you can trust.
6. Ask whether your faith development at KSU is leading to more openness toward others, toward life educationally and emotionally or toward exclusiveness and emotional enclosure.

We suggest these resources on campus for information and support:

1. Coordinator of Religious Activities, Don Fallon, 532-6432
2. Associate Dean of Student Life, Carla Jones, 532-6432
3. Counseling Services, 532-6927

Students decorate creatively on budgets

Trendy decorations spice up plain rooms, provide cheap luxury.

By CASSIDY HILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Funky lamps, clocks and chairs can turn an ordinary room into something more creative and colorful.

Brian Collins, manager of The Futon Store, in Aggieville, said college students like to buy inexpensive furniture that makes their apartment or house creative and fun.

"One of the most popular furniture pieces that we sell are the futons, because they are relatively cheaper than a couch," Collins said. "College students normally have small living-quarter space and love these futons, because they can fit into small spaces, giving more room for decorating."

Dan Siebert, freshman in civil engineering, said his futon not only is comfortable but also allows people to sit or lie on it because it folds out into a bed.

"It is really comfortable to sit on a futon while watching TV," Siebert said. "It is also really nice when company comes over. The futon folds out into a bed and allows for more space."

Other popular decorating accessories at The Futon Store include bean bags, "poof" chairs (bean-bag chairs that have been emptied and filled with chunks of foam) and Plato futons, which are love-seat futons that fold out into a full-size bed.

"The poof chairs are very squishy, which mold to your body when sitting in it and then they fluff back up after use," Collins said. "It feels like sitting on your own cloud."

Futons costs about $200, compared with a cheap couch, which sell for about $100.

Most college students have little say in what types of furniture they will receive, because they tend to furnish with hand-me-downs from parents and relatives, but they can add personal touches to their homes with accessories.

Bill Kaszer, manager of Humble Abode Home Furnishings on 321 Fort Riley Blvd., said the little things in his store can make a room interesting and fun.

"Funky lamps, mirrors, clocks, martini glasses, rugs, desks, tap curtains and candles is what makes a college student's apartment, dorm and house neat," Kaszer said. "We try to sell items that attract young adults. Our furniture is getting less formal and more creative."

Papasan chairs seem to be a popular piece of furniture, Susan Mickey, store owner of Pier 1 Imports, in Manhattan Town Center, said.

"Anything storage — baskets, desks, candles, vases, glasses, table setting and especially papasan chairs — are really popular with the college students, since most of the items are inexpensive and functional," Mickey said. "Candles are a really inexpensive way to decorate."

Students who show their K-State ID cards at Pier 1 Imports receive a 10- to 15-percent discount on all non-sale items throughout the year. The store also has a back-to-school sale, which begins at the start of every school year. This gives students a 20-percent discount on all items, excluding those items already on sale.

Julie Williams, freshman in open-option, said the papasan chairs that Pier 1 Imports carries are comfortable and come in a variety of cushion colors.

"The papasan chairs are so comfortable that I have almost fallen asleep in it several times," Williams said. "Since there are so many different colors of cushions to choose from, it should be easy to match and to coordinate your room."

The papasan chairs at Pier 1 Imports are sold for around $135-$145, including the cushion. During the back-to-school sale, the same chair runs around $99.

Julie Strecker, owner of Geometrics on Poyntz Avenue, said college students like to purchase items from her store that are useful for more than one function. The favorites include such items as computer desks with pullout keyboard trays, rolling file drawers that double as nightstands and bookcases that can hold several items.

"The computer desks, which are already assembled, are the most popular piece of furniture," Strecker said.

Web site offers scholarships

By ROBIN ESTRIN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — An Internet site to be launched today is promising to give away $10,000 a day in college scholarship money. No essay required. No nerve-wracking interview. Just the luck of the draw.

The folks at FreeScholarships.com know the sweepstakes might sound too good to be true, but it's the latest of a host of Web sites handing out millions to Web surfers willing to tell marketers about themselves.

The scholarships from the new Cambridge-based company are financed largely by marketers and advertisers who are particularly keen on the teen-age and 20-something markets.

The incentives for coughing up demographic information are great. FreeScholarships plans to award an additional $25,000 every month and $50,000 each quarter, in addition to the daily giveaway of $10,000.

The money is available for college, graduate school and even private school for children. College grads with loans to pay off also are eligible, as are parents planning for future college bills. Winners need only be U.S. citizens older than 13.

The Web site sounds well-intentioned enough, said Mark Cannon, deputy executive director of the National Association for College Admission Counseling, which represents guidance counselors and admissions officers.

Still, he said, "You don't need to be a sweepstakes winner to afford college."

To ensure the money goes to school and not a new car or vacation, the company will send the check directly to the college, bank or other lending program, Chuck Digate, the company's founder, said.

Site visitors must register to be eligible. Visitors earn more chances by playing games, answering surveys, referring friends and clicking on ads.

Winners, chosen by a computer-generated random drawing, can win more than once. The odds of hitting the jackpot depend on how many log on.

"It's a low-energy path for people to get a shot at helping them pay for school," Digate said.

FreeScholarships is billing itself as unique in a Web world of quick money. Others have offered one-time scholarship sweepstakes — Embark.com just wrapped up a promotion with a grand prize of four years' tuition up to $80,000.

FreeScholarships is generating mixed reviews in higher education circles.

Buyer beware, cautioned Timothy McDonough, spokesman for the American Council on Education, a Washington, D.C.-based higher education trade group.

"You're always concerned about the possibility of some kind of scam activity," McDonough said. He also said the Web site's financial information might not be the most reliable.

Dallas Martin, president of the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators, said anything that helps students confront college costs should be commended.

"So what if there's a commercial side to it?" he said.

Free money on the Web is a booming business. Iwon.com, which offers cash jackpots to Web surfers, is ranked among the 50 most popular sites of the 21,000 sites followed by the Internet survey firm MediaMetrix.

The reality, of course, is most site visitors never win the big bucks. So FreeScholarships also provides tips on financial aid, with links to national scholarship programs.

The Cryptoquip is a substitution cipher in which one letter stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters, short words and words using an apostrophe give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is by trial and error.

MIXmasters

Mix Masters is a weekly feature on Thursdays profiling local bartenders and their signature drinks. Suggestions for featured bartenders are welcome to the arts & entertainment editor at arts@spub.ksu.edu.

Name: Heather Meng

Bar: Mel's Tavern

General info

Heather Meng, senior in biology and microbiology, has worked as a bartender at Mel's Tavern for seven months. Meng said she started bartending a year ago because the money is good. Meng got her recipe from a friend who messed up one drink and created Sara's White Bulldog.

the drink

Sara's White Bulldog:
1 oz. vanilla liqueur
1 oz. vodka fill glass with equal parts of half and half and Coca-Cola Classic

*Do not substitute Pepsi Cola for Coca-Cola Classic. Milk may be substituted for half and half.

for SALE

Baking club sells goodies weekly in Shellenberger Hall

Organizations have sold baked goods for money since the beginning of fund raising.

With the Bakery Science and Management Club, it's more than a bake sale.

Marvin Willyard, club adviser, said the club has had bake sales for at least 30 years. He said when he was in the club, the sales were specialized for the holidays.

"They were doing bake sales as far back as 30 years ago," he said. "In those days, we focused on holiday sales. Today, they sell a variety of products each week."

Each Tuesday, more than 160 dozen cookies, 100 loaves of bread and a large batch of specialty items are produced in the Shellenberger Hall baking lab. The goods are sold at a bake sale from 3 to 5 p.m. Wednesdays in the hallway of Shellenberger.

Jeremiah Tilghman, senior in bakery science and club president, said about 30 of the club's 50 members meet in the lab each week to prepare cookies and bread products to be sold at the weekly sale.

"We meet every Tuesday from 4 p.m. until around 10 p.m. to prepare for the Wednesday sales," Tilghman said. "We sell the stuff to raise money for members to go to the American Society of Baking and other conventions."

Club members earn points on the number of recorded hours they spend baking in the labs. The points are tallied for eligibility of financial assistance to help with convention expenses.

Tilghman said most of the club members come from majors relating to the baking industry, but any K-State student is welcome to join.

"Most of the students are bakery science or graduate students, but we accept any major," he said. "We have students in graphic design, engineering and many others."

Rebekah Rokey, junior in hotel and restaurant management and club treasurer, said the bake sales have become popular among students and faculty on campus. She said most all of the products are sold at each sale.

"We usually have really long lines at the beginning of the sales," Rokey said. "Monster cookies are definitely the almost popular item. We always sell all of those in the first 30 to 45 minutes."

Leftover cookies are frozen in the lab and sold the next week at a discounted rate. Bread products left after the sales are donated to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Outside of the weekly sales in Shellenberger, the club sends about 20 dozen cookies to the Dairy Bar at Call Hall for individual sale. Special baking also is done for holidays and for the All-University Open House.

Rokey said the excess of baking sometimes gets a little crazy, but the delegation of team leaders lessens the chaos.

"We have team leaders for each product," she said. "Leaders get people to help them through the whole process."

Jesse Weilert, senior in bakery science and production manager, said he is responsible for making sure the club has all of the ingredients necessary to produce the goods.

"We're responsible for picking out the products we want to make that night," he said. "We are responsible for making sure we have all of the ingredients in the lab."

Melanie Haines, sophomore in bakery science and production manager, said the club seeks out companies that are willing to donate products. Flour, chocolate chips, peanut butter and baking mix are some of the items donated.

"A lot of the essentials are donated," Haines said. "We're responsible for searching out the companies who will donate."

Haines said production managers also are responsible for problems on baking nights.

"We're kind of the responsible people when things go wrong," she said. "Whenever there are problems with the ovens or equipment, we try to fix them."

Problems, although rare, do occur during baking. Haines said if members work together, the number of problems is kept to a minimum.

"We make messes more often than we ruin things," she said. "It usually runs pretty smoothly. If we all work together, things usually turn out all right."

Weilert said even though it is a student-run organization, the customer still is the most important aspect of it.

"We're trying to sell high-quality products you can't find in the supermarket," he said. "If something is wrong with a product, we won't sell it."

Erin Jamison, freshman in bakery science, mixes ingredients for lemon poppy seed muffins. The Bakery Science and Management Club meets every Tuesday night to make baked goods to sell.

Kreem Kup one of Manhattan's best-kept secrets

By SARAH MCCAFFREY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEAN

Quality food. Cheap prices. Family atmosphere.

The Kreem Kup Store, on Yuma Street, is one of Manhattan's best-kept secrets and a college student's dream come true. The Kreem Kup has been a family owned and operated business for 49 years and continues to offer competitive pricing.

The family-owned Kreem Kup has a long history in Manhattan. The restaurant opened June 18, 1951, by the current owner's father, Ben West. The Kreem Kup began as an ice cream shop, similar to a Dairy Queen. Throughout the years, other items such as hamburgers, pork tenderloins and pie have been added to the menu.

The restaurant changed ownership when it was bought by Gaylord West, Ben West's brother, about a year after it was opened.

The Kreem Kup remained in operation until February 1991, when Gaylord West died.

Keeping with the tradition of family ownership, David West, the original proprietor's son, reopened the dining establishment in June 1991.

In the age of chain restaurants and mass marketing, the Kreem Kup's staying power is quite remarkable, David West said.

Business has been so good for the Kreem Kup there is no need to advertise, he said.

Unlike many commercial restaurants, the Kreem Kup makes its hamburgers fresh everyday.

"Everything's fresh," David West said. "That's one reason why we're different."

David West said the low prices continue to draw old and new customers alike. There aren't many places that sell hamburgers and french fries for $2.

"The low prices bring the people," Bob Lewis, Kreem Kup employee, said. Kreem Kup continues to draw many of its original customers.

Many long-time patrons such as Grice Sexton, who helped build the restaurant in 1951, still come to the restaurant on a daily basis.

"Part of the appeal is having a lot of the same people come in day after day," Adeline West, Kreem Kup employee, said. "When they don't come in, you know someone is sick or something is wrong."

Although the eating establishment remains popular with its long-time patrons, David West said more college students are starting to frequent the restaurant.

David West said the restaurant also is popular with Manhattan High School students because of its convenient location and cheap prices.

Beside locals, the Kreem Kup's clientele includes some famous faces.

"Garth Brooks' band members are here," David West said.

confined to a wheelchair, speak at their meetings to become more aware of the issue. Peterson, also a former student body president, was a member of Farmhouse while he was a K-State student.

Peterson said one concern of fraternities and sororities is that building a ramp to the front door would be unsightly.

"But there are nice ways to do that architecturally," he said. "Fraternities and sororities go through additions and renovations all the time. As they plan these projects, they need to think about these issues."

While Peterson lived at Farmhouse, he said the house poured concrete to make a ramp at the back door to make it handicap accessible.

"A lot of times it's very simple, small things that don't have a lot of cost," he said. "It certainly wasn't a by the book kind of deal, but simple to do and relatively inexpensive and functional."

Peterson said it's important that fraternities and sororities make steps to become more handicap accessible because the experience of living in and being a part of a house is great.

John Bloomfield, vice-president of Farmhouse, said that when Peterson was president of Farmhouse, the fraternity also put a handicap-accessible bathroom in the president's room. With recent renovations, Bloomfield said Farmhouse put a handicap accessible guest bathroom on the same level as the living room, dining room and educational area.

"That's the most significant change as far as handicap accessibility," he said.

Farmhouse also replaced all its doorknobs to make them more handicap accessible, Bloomfield said.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said many other fraternities and sororities already have made steps or are planning to make steps to make sure their houses are handicap accessible.

Even though the houses aren't required by law to become ADA compliant, Bosco said he is greatly encouraging all the houses to take these steps.

"Cost is always a consideration, but hopefully we'll be able to come up with some creative solutions, because our fraternities and sororities want everyone to join if they wish," he said.

Holden said she and the two women aren't asking that the houses become completely ADA compliant.

"We're not saying you should go and spend $10 million and put elevators in every single house," she said.

Holden said there are some quick fixes to make houses accessible, and the students are flexible. She said the woman who went through rush was willing to accept that she couldn't live in the house.

"That wasn't her goal," Holden said. "She was perfectly willing to accept that limitation, but membership still eluded her."

Fed raises key interest rate for 4th time since June

By MARTIN CRUTSINGER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Federal Reserve, still seeking to slow the supercharged U.S. economy, raised borrowing costs for millions of Americans for a fourth time since June by pushing a key interest rate up a quarter point to 5.75 percent Wednesday.

The Fed action to boost its federal funds rate, the interest that banks charge each other, quickly was followed by announcements from banks around the country that they were raising their prime lending rate a similar quarter point to 8.75 percent, the highest level for this benchmark consumer and business rate since late 1995.

Wall Street, which had been worried that the central bank might feel the need to raise rates by a half-point, turned in a mixed performance Wednesday with the Dow Jones industrial average down 38.85 points at 11,003.20.

Analysts said that while the Fed stopped with just a quarter-point increase, investors clearly were worried by the tone of the Fed announcement, which indicated further increases were in store.

"This was a much more hawkish statement from the Fed today than any of the statements that accompanied its three rate hikes last year," said David Jones, chief economist at Aubrey G. Lanston & Co. in New York.

Many economists predicted the Fed would raise rates again at the next meeting of its Federal Open Market Committee on March 21 and again at the May 16 meeting. Some analysts said the unrelenting strength of the economy could prompt a seventh quarter-point move at the June 28 meeting.

"The Fed wants to bring this high-flying economy down to a soft landing," said Richard Yamarone, an economist at Argus Research Corp. "The rate increases so far haven't really taken a toll on the economy, especially the consumer sector."

While private economists saw the economic logic behind the Fed's actions, a small band of critics complained that the central bank was fighting a phantom menace, given that outside of rising energy costs, inflation has remained exceptionally low despite a strong economy that has pushed unemployment to a 30-year low of 4.1 percent.

"A little nick here, a little nick there; pretty soon you're bleeding pretty badly," Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, said of the four rate increases in the past six months.

Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., complained that the Fed's rate increases impose a tax on every single American citizen through higher interest rates, all to fight what Dorgan said was a nonexistent inflation threat.

Harkin and Dorgan spoke on the Senate floor as the Senate debated whether to confirm Alan

In addition to boosting the federal funds rate, the Fed increased its largely symbolic discount rate, the rate that the Fed charges to make direct loans to banks, by a quarter point to 5.25 percent.

Greenspan, 73, for a fourth four-year term as Fed chairman.

Greenspan was expected to win the confirmation vote easily, with Senate Banking Committee Chairman Phil Gramm, R-Texas, saying his 12-year record as Fed chairman could be used to build a strong case that Alan Greenspan is the greatest central banker in the history of the world.

The Senate was scheduled to vote on Greenspan's nomination today.

In addition to boosting the federal funds rate, the Fed increased its largely symbolic discount rate, the rate that the Fed charges to make direct loans to banks, by a quarter point to 5.25 percent.

In the statement announcing the Fed decisions, the policy-makers said they remained concerned that the strong economy and tight labor markets will produce rising wage demands that will not be offset by gains in productivity.

"Such trends could foster inflationary imbalances that would undermine the economy's record economic expansion," the Fed said in explaining its decision.

While productivity, the amount of output per hour of work, has shown big gains in recent years, Greenspan has expressed growing worries that the dwindling supply of available workers eventually will overwhelm these productivity increases, forcing employers to raise product prices to cover their higher wage costs.

Bruce Steinberg, chief economist at Merrill Lynch in New York said he expected upcoming unemployment reports to be the biggest factor guiding Fed policies.

"The Fed does not want to see further declines in the unemployment rate," Steinberg said, forecasting that Friday's report will show the jobless rate dipping in January to 4 percent.

In the first use of its new disclosure policy, the Fed said it viewed future risks weighted mainly toward conditions that may generate heightened inflation pressures.

A string of recent indicators have shown the economy, which set a record this month for the longest expansion in U.S. history, was growing at a rate of 5.8 percent in the fourth quarter.

On Wednesday, the government reported that sales of new single-family homes set a record for the second straight year with 904,000 homes sold in 1999, up 2 percent from 1998, indicating that rising mortgage rates have had little effect so

City Commissioner Ed Klimek said he is aware of other Kansas cities' push for smoking ordinances.

As of now, though, banning smoking in public areas in Manhattan is not on the Commission's agenda.

"We have not tackled such an ordinance in Manhattan," Klimek said. "That would have to be something that would have to be brought before us as an agenda item. We would have to see what they're asking for and the specifics of the plan. I think we would be open to looking at this."

Heinrich said he hopes the issue will be on City Commission's agenda for review by the end of March.

"It's a process. You have to bring up issues and let it run its course," he said. "Hopefully, we will gain enough support that it will be an issue for years to come."

I know that usually when you see an asterisk (like this * one) after the word free, it's not. But this is: We want to give you a free Macintosh iMac computer. All you have to do is come into our new branch to register for it.

Sure, we don't really want to just give it to you. When you come to register, we'll probably start with some small talk and then tell you about our Visa Check Card, or Internet Banking. And if we find out you're graduating in May, we'll tell you about a good way to get a new car to compliment that new job of yours.

So come register for this free Macintosh iMac computer at the new Commerce Bank branch on the south side of the Student Union's first floor. Besides a free Macintosh iMac computer, we'll have free refreshments and, as always, free checking.

Souljah advocates free thought, expression

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/COLLEGIAN

Sister Souljah addresses a crowd of close to 100 people in the K-State Student Union Courtyard on Thursday night. She was speaking on campus as part of Black History Month.

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students should not be people who learn and regurgitate what they are taught, Sister Souljah, political advocate and community activist, said.

"This is the place where a lot of thinking is supposed to be going on," Souljah said. "This is the only time in your life you will have unlimited access to resources. Take advantage of it."

Souljah was the keynote speaker for Black History Month, sponsored by the Black Student Union and Student Governing Association. She spoke to almost 100 students in the Union Courtyard on Thursday night. Before Souljah stepped to the podium, Jerome Alexander, junior in computer science, said he was anticipating an exceptional speaker.

"The speaker that is coming here is dynamic, and it is well worth my time," Alexander said.

The loss of connection to education, black heritage, religion and several other issues were brought up during the speech.

Souljah compared African culture to the American culture.

"It is a different way of thinking. It is a different way of believing, and it is a different way of being," Souljah said. "In Africa, 'I' means 'we.' In American culture, 'I' means 'I.'"

Her philosophy on the upbringing of women and men differed between African and American cultures.

Souljah said there are two philosophies for women. For African women, she said the rules were established by their relatives and it was a decision based on unity.

"In America, to be a woman is to be cute and stupid. You are supposed to shop a lot to be sexy, sexual — and to find a man to foot your bills," Souljah said. "Women that are intelligent, aggressive and perceptive are told they are not women."

Outer beauty is not what women should be known for, Souljah said.

"Many women are beautiful, but their physical attributes are not their finest hour," she said.

For the male members of the audience, Souljah said they need to find a connection with religion.

"You must be connected to an existence greater than yourself," she said. "If you don't humble yourself to a creator, you are saying that you are God."

Finding out values is a key part of the learning process, Souljah said.

"You must decide what you believe in. I'm not here to tell you what to believe in — you need to know what you believe in," she said. "If you don't know what you believe in, the definition of you will change every day."

Megan McGurk, graduate student in English, said she has followed Souljah's career since she was a rapper with Public Enemy.

"I'm a feminist, so I am interested in what she has to say about African-American women," McGurk said. "I think she represents a voice that is not often heard in Kansas."

Manhattan High School East Campus ninth-graders Troy Morgan (left) Stephen Pretzer and Mat Plummer rally with 650 other Kansas high school students Thursday on the steps of the Statehouse in Topeka. The rally, organized by Teens Against Smoking in Kansas, was an attempt by the teenagers to convince legislators to continue to create anti-smoking legislation.

Death stood quietly at her side.

She had an oxygen mask and was making her way through the crowd. People swarmed around her, chanting, their emotions increased by the constant pounding of drums and trumpets.

She represented a dying smoker, and her friend was the Grim Reaper. They were part of the 650 Kansas students rallying Thursday for legislators to form anti-tobacco laws.

The high school and middle school students, who came from every corner in Kansas, participated in the fifth annual rally of Smoke-free Teens Arising. They marched from the Topeka Performing Arts Center to the Statehouse and later met with legislators to voice their concerns.

"I think smoking is really a community norm in Kansas," said Jackie Feeney, senior at Manhattan High School. "We haven't really been taught that it's wrong, especially in a college town. Over 50 percent of my high school smokes, and it's a teen problem we need to take care of."

A youth advisory board, Teens Against Smoking in Kansas, organized this event. They invited students from Florida and Mississippi who are involved in anti-smoking campaigns in their states.

It hasn't been easy, said Mary Clift Hitt, a senior from Mississippi.

"Teen-agers are our biggest challenge. You know how they don't want to listen to anyone," Clift Hitt said. "We can't really say 'don't smoke' a second time. You just have to say, 'Here are the facts, and you just help yourself. Make your own choice. If you want to live a healthy lifestyle, you don't smoke. If not, well, that's your choice, but we're not going to tell you not to.'"

Adolescents, however, are just part of the reason why students came to the rally.

Hilary Clark, an eighth-grader at Manhattan Middle School, said she's upset some of her family members smoke.

"I'm totally against it," Clark said. "Smoking isn't cool. Most people think it's a loser tactic."

These opinions are supported by Rep. Henry Helgeson, D-Wichita, whose Heinrich proposes bid to support smoking ban

By JENNIFER GIER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Body President Jason Heinrich and several co-authors introduced a resolution in Student Senate on Thursday that, if approved, would give support to the city of Manhattan to eliminate smoking in public places.

"There is a lot of campus support and a lot of community support out there," Heinrich said.

More than 15 members of Senate were co-authors of the resolution showing support for a smoke-free environment.

The senators' upcoming debate on the issue was not popular with all students.

"I think as long as we are not smoking in non-designated areas, I don't think we are infringing on anyone's rights," Adriana Harnish, freshman in economics, said.

The resolution stated that statistics on smoking found smoking indoors contributes to indoor air pollution, and breathing secondhand smoke can cause disease.

Vote makes residence halls smoke-free

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A vote made during Wednesday's meeting of the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls has deemed all K-State residence halls smoke-free beginning in fall 2001.

In preparation for the smoke-free policy, all K-State residence halls must become 70-percent smoke-free by the fall 2000 semester.

Dave Woodruff, president of KSUARH, said the idea to ban smoking began from talks among hall staff and governing officers. Opinions of residents also were used to get an idea of what outlawing smoking would mean.

"We kind of polled the residents to find out what they wanted, and we decided to make this proposal," Woodruff said. "It was a very difficult decision. It took at least two hours of discussion for it to be set forth as a policy."

The phasing-out of smoking will begin as early as Sunday, when some residence hall governing boards will begin voting on which areas to designate as smoking areas.

"At West, there are 10 wings and seven are smoke-free, so we're already at 70 percent," said Sarah Decker, residence life coordinator at West Hall and co-adviser for KSUARH. "We will be voting on Sunday to decide which floors are smoke-free next semester."

Decker said the difficult part of phasing out smoking floors for some halls would be providing options for students wishing to live on specialty floors.

Basketball reunion to honor coach

■ Winter to be commended at halftime of Colorado game.

By SAM STIERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's basketball program will honor one of its legends Saturday. Fred "Tex" Winter will be honored throughout the day, with a luncheon beginning at 11 a.m.

Ernie Barrett, director of athletic development and former K-State basketball player, said Winter is being recognized not only for his effect on the court, but off the court as well.

"He was my coach here at K-State," Barrett said. "I honestly chose K-State because of Coach Winter. This is just another great honor to bestow on a mastermind in the game of basketball."

Winter spent 15 years as K-State's head basketball coach and left a lasting effect on his players' lives. He also has the highest percentage of wins of any K-State coach. He will be recognized before Saturday's game against Colorado and during halftime along with former players. Barrett said Winter will be presented with a bronze bust of himself that will be placed in the Legends Room at Bramlage Coliseum. The bronze bust was created by Hayden Abbott, another of Winter's former players.

"There are two things that make Tex Winter such a great coach," Abbott said. "First is that he treats his players so well, and he's such a student of the game of basketball. He just loves coaching so much."

Abbott played for Winter from 1954 to 1958, and helped take K-State to the Final Four his senior year. Abbott also praised Winter as a person.

"He meant so much to myself and my family," Abbott said.

The tribute was instigated by Abbott, and K-State decided to tie it in with a reunion of former K-State basketball players.

"He is a legend at K-State and we appreciate him so much," Barrett said.

At 77 years old, Winter is the oldest active basketball coach, and his 54 years of professional and Division I basketball coaching experience are the longest among active coaches.

Winter is best known outside of K-State for creating the "triple post offense," also known as the sideline triangle. Winter has spent 50 years perfecting the offense that helped propel the Chicago Bulls to six NBA championships during the 1990s.

The system has been copied by high schools around the country, as well as by other NBA teams. The system is complicated but effective.

He now is an assistant coach for the Los Angeles Lakers.

Winter began his basketball career as a player for the University of Southern California. In 1947, he started a five-year stint as K-State's first full-time assistant basketball coach. The next season he became the head coach of Marquette University, and at age 28 was the youngest college coach in the country.

Winter returned to K-State in 1953, where he served as head coach for 15 years. During his tenure at K-State, he compiled a 256-117 record.

Winter also led K-State to eight Big 8 Championships, more than any other K-State coach. In 1958, Winter led K-State over a Wilt Chamberlain-led KU team

Video contest gives chance to win cash prizes, air time

Winners of a video contest sponsored by The Christophers, a nonprofit media organization, will receive cash awards and their entries will be aired nationally.

College students can enter a video illustrating the theme, "One person can make a difference."

The 13th annual contest will award $3,000 for the first-place entry, $2,000 for second place and $1,000 for the third.

Umberto Migardi, young adult program coordinator, said The Christophers believe in the power of the individual and the idea that one person can make a difference.

"The idea here is to take college students majoring in communications and make them realize they are dealing with the most powerful tool we have today to make changes," Migardi said. "Anyone can enter. A good portion of our past winners come from other studies."

All winning videos will be aired during a broadcast of Christopher Closeup, a syndicated television program that reaches millions of Americans and 166 foreign countries.

"Publicity is something aspiring film producers value more than the cash prizes," Migardi said.

The contest doesn't offer a lot of limitations, he said.

The videos must be less than five minutes long and must illustrate the theme. Past entries have used actors, animation, clay animation, live action and stop-action videos.

Entries are due June 16.

Those registering online are asked to print off the completed form and send it in with their tape, Migardi said.

"Our mission is to help people understand that they are unique," Migardi said. "We believe in the power of the individual and that one person can make a difference."

Entry forms can be obtained by writing to: College Video Contest, The Christophers, 12 East 48th St. New York, NY 10017, or by calling (212) 759-4050 or online at www.christophers.org/vidcon2k.html.

Pizza delivery man robbed by Wichita boys ages 9, 13

WICHITA — Two young boys robbed a delivery driver at gunpoint for $28 worth of pizza, police said.

The boys called in a pizza delivery order for a vacant home Tuesday night. When the driver showed up with the food, the older boy pulled a handgun, police spokesman Bob Circle said.

The boys made off with the pizza they had ordered before police arrived. No one was hurt.

The driver estimated that the suspects' ages were 9 and 13, police Lt. Richard Oliverson said.

The FBI Violent Crimes Task Force will handle the robbery.

A Pizza Hut spokesman said the restaurant chains take a variety of precaution for its delivery drivers. Spokesman Jay Allison said he could not elaborate for security reasons.

Head of Mattel Inc. resigns due to falling sales, profits

NEW YORK — Mattel Inc. chief executive Jill Barad resigned Thursday after coming under fire for months for failing to lift declining sales and profits at the world's biggest toymaker.

Her departure came as the El Segundo, Calif.-based Mattel reported a steep loss for the fourth quarter, disappointing Wall Street analysts for three of the past four quarters.

Barad, one of the highest ranking women in business, was under intense pressure for months from investors and Mattel's board to explain big losses at the company's newly acquired Learning Company software division and other troubles at Mattel.

The board appointed two of its own members to leadership roles, picking William Rollnick as acting chairman and Ronald Loeb as acting chief executive officer.

"I think they need to look themselves in the eyes, look at what the problems are with this company and really try to figure them out," said Sean McGowan, a toy analyst at the investment firm Gerard Klauer Mattison.

For the quarter ending Dec. 31, Mattel reported a loss of $18.4 million, or 4 cents a share, compared with profits of $86.7 million, or 22 cents a share, in the same period a year ago.

TAKE note

Topeka news. Local school boards worry the State Board of Education has too much power and think the Legislature needs more control.

That was the message delivered Thursday to the House Education Committee.

Mark Tallman, a lobbyist for the Kansas Association of School Boards, requested numerous changes in the state's supervision of elementary, junior high and high schools.

An odd number of school board members would eliminate the possibility of tie votes, he said. The state board now has 10 members.

Tallman also said board members should be elected on a nonpartisan basis, and their elections should be on the same ballot as local school boards, usually in the spring.

Now they run in November along with state and federal candidates.

The board's power to set education policy independently should be eliminated so that it would be accountable to the Legislature, he said. The board has no system of checks and balances, he said.

But some committee members are unsure of the need to curtail the board's power.

"There may be a bogeyman you want to get rid of that doesn't really exist," said Rep. Marti Crow, D-Leavenworth. "I'm not sure there's an issue."

Several committee members also expressed concern about traditionally lower voter turnouts in spring elections.

Professor awarded Fellow distinction

By MAGGIE MARTIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bikram S. Gill, university distinguished professor, never thought growing up on a wheat farm in India would lead to international recognition.

Gill recently received the distinction of Fellow from the American Association for the Advancement of Science for his role in developing and improving wheat genetics.

"I never thought I would win this award," Gill said. "My goal was just to improve wheat."

"I really enjoy my work. Winning this award was just a bonus."

The AAAS represents the world's largest association of scientists. In order to receive the distinction, distinguished contributions to the profession and efforts toward advancing science must be made.

Gill came to K-State in 1979 after receiving his master's degree in botany at Punjab University in India and his doctorate in genetics at the University of California at Davis.

"K-State has the biggest wheat-improvement program in the country," Gill said. "This is the best place to work on wheat genetics."

In 1984, K-State established the Wheat Genetics Resource Center. Gill is the director of the center.

"We have a very large research team and winning this award is a great honor for all of us," Gill said.

The WGRCC conserves wheat germ plasma, which is used in wheat improvement and developing new wheat varieties by using new and better genetics, he said. The germ plasma is the building block of wheat.

"Seventy percent of the wheat varieties used in Kansas are bred at K-State," Gill said. "Wheat is a true seed crop. Farmers can save it and use it to replant the next year's crop."

"This gives scientists a chance to make a huge impact with new developments."

The WGRCC has been able to increase the yield of wheat by 1 percent a year. In the 1990s, wheat yields averaged 10 bushels per acre. With the help of new genetics, wheat now yields an average of 45 bushels per acre, Gill said.

Robert Zeigler, professor and head of the Department of Plant Pathology, said nothing but the highest caliber of research comes from Gill's program.

"This commitment contributes to K-State's international reputation for excellence in the plant sciences," he said.

Besides his research responsibilities, Gill also teaches graduate-level classes and advises graduate students in plant pathology.

Justin Faris, research associate, worked with Gill as a graduate student working toward his doctorate.

"Dr. Gill is as true as they come," Faris said. "Not only is he a prominent researcher, but he is committed to teaching and training graduate students."

"He does almost anything possible to assure that his students are successful. Even after his students graduate, leave and start new jobs, he does what he can to help them get on their feet," he said.

Gill's research now is directed toward chemically identifying every gene in the wheat plant.

Gill worries about the public's perception of genetically modified crops.

"The wheat crop arose from genetic modification in nature," he said. "We are trying to find ways to improve plants to make them safe. Our research leads to cost-effective, environmentally safe plants."

Gill has received numerous honors. The Kansas Association of Wheat Growers named him "Wheat Man of the Year" in 1997. In 1999, he received the Outstanding Scientist Award from the Association of Agricultural Scientists of Indian Origin, and he is listed among the Century's 10 Sikh Scientists.

He was a National Academy of Sciences visiting professor to West Germany in 1987 and to Russia and the Ukraine in 1994.

Gill is a member of the Genetics Society of America, and Fellow of the American Society of Agronomy and the American Phytopathological Society. He will receive his award at the AAAS annual meeting this month.

"Dr. Gill is an excellent research scientist and is regarded by his peers as an international authority on wheat genetics," Faris said. "His staple knowledge of the history and current status of wheat genetics is nearly unparalleled at this point in time."

Gill wants to continue learning about the wheat plant and better ways to improve it, while sharing his knowledge with others.

"I'd like to make the germ plasma bank bigger and better to help serve the wheat improvement efforts," he said.

"I'd also like to train more graduate students. It gives me great satisfaction."

Lou Douglas lecturer to focus on WTO struggle

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., will present a Lou Douglas Lecture on Monday.

Frank will voice his opinion on the World Trade Organization struggle in his lecture, "New Deal vs. Trickle-down: The International Context" at 7:30 p.m. in Forum Hall, located in the K-State Student Union.

Phil Anderson, Lou Douglas Lecture Series committee member, said Frank was chosen to present the lecture because of his progressive point of view and outspoken nature.

"Frank is a very effective speaker who focuses on issues that are a real concern," Anderson said.

Anderson said Frank will speak on the recent issues the WTO has dealt with in the Seattle riots.

"The struggle is not an American struggle, but a struggle that is playing out on a worldwide stage," Anderson said. "It could be a defining moment in world history, and I believe that is what Frank is going to focus upon."

Beverly Earles-Law, Lou Douglas Lecture Series coordinator, said Frank's pragmatism and liberal views were some of the reasons he was chosen to present the lecture.

"Frank is a person that acts upon issues he believes strongly about," Earles-Law said. "He is a worker, not a talker, much like Lou Douglas himself."

Anderson said the Lou Douglas Lecture Series committee likes to bring speakers like Frank because of their successful political background.

"Barney Frank is a person who has been involved with politics most of his adult life," Anderson said. "He is fun, thoughtful and fair-minded in his politics."

Frank has been a member of the House of Representatives from Massachusetts for 20 years and has served on committees such as the House Judiciary and Banking Financial Services committees.

Frank earned his law degree from Harvard Law School and taught at the University of Massachusetts-Boston, the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University and Boston University.

Earles-Law said Frank's speech will deal with issues of human rights, which she feels to be an important aspect of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

"Frank's stance on issues of social policy and human rights equity is something that can be of benefit to everyone," Earles-Law said.

Jessica Johnson, freshman in pre-journalism/mass communications, said she is attending the lecture for a class assignment and hopes Frank will present new information about the WTO struggle.

"I am going to fulfill an assignment for speech class," Johnson said. "But I am looking forward to hearing Frank's opinion on the World Trade Organization."

Anderson said he hopes the people who attend the lecture have a keen interest in the nation and the future of the world.

"The World Trade Organization struggle is an important topic dealing with everyone's future," Anderson said. "Frank will present a speech that will be fun and interesting, but will deal with real issues that affect us all."

Students use Virtual Career Fair after server problems resolved

By SARAH SOURK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a setback Monday, the Virtual Career Fair is up and running, said Mary Marston, assistant director and coordinator of experiential learning.

The fair was scheduled to start Monday, but due to a server problem, businesses were unable to get online to view student's résumés.

"Over 3,000 students are registered to be in the Virtual Career Fair," Marston said. "Obviously most have registered for the Career Fair, but also for interviews, jobs online and full-time as well as internship information year-round."

Scott Smith, sophomore in information systems, utilized the service. Smith said he has used K-State's Career and Employment Services before, but found out about the Virtual Career Fair from K-State's Web page. "Career and Employment Services has helped me out a lot with getting me a job last summer and giving me numbers to call this year," said Smith, who was referred there by his brother.

Although Smith hasn't been offered an internship from any of the companies using the Virtual Career Fair, he has been in contact with them.

"I am hoping to find a job where I can troubleshoot, install computers and work with computer programs — just anything computer related," Smith said.

Holly Bigge, senior in agricultural economics, also used the Virtual Career Fair.

She said it will help her gain experience and decide on a career.

"I am hoping to find an accounting internship to make sure that I really want to be a CPA and pursue my master's in accounting," Bigge said.

The Virtual Career Fair is scheduled to end today, but may be extended due to its late start.

Students should attend speech about WTO

The World Trade Organization is not everything it's cracked up to be.

The WTO is an international organization that deals with the global rules of trade between nations. Its function is to see that trade flows as smoothly and freely as possible.

However, the WTO — and unfettered free trade — is not always a blessing.

That's because the WTO is a supranational organization that has some control over individual countries. This control takes away from the sovereignty of independent nations. This means the WTO — theoretically — has the power to enforce laws contrary to those the United States possesses.

In addition to the reduction of sovereignty, the WTO actually slows the progress of less developed countries — the opposite of its stated design.

Because it promotes free trade, tariffs and other barriers that normally would be imposed by these countries are not permitted.

Therefore, they are unable to develop into world powers, as the United States did early in the 20th century. Instead of helping these countries, the WTO simply allows more powerful countries to expand their power by exporting goods to other countries without any restrictions.

The WTO also has what some consider a good side — a move toward a more global world.

However, many people do not have their own stance on this issue — they only follow the stance of the country's leaders. Instead of taking their word for it, students should find out exactly what the issue is all about.

When Rep.

Barney Frank, D-Mass., speaks at 7:30 p.m. Monday in Forum Hall, students will have the opportunity to find out more about this topic that many are not up-to-date on.

Take the time to go and develop your own opinion on the issue.

Find out that there is more to the WTO than a utopian global society. A global society might be inevitable, but the WTO is not the way to go about it.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

I agree with Schroeder that something needs to be changed in the way we run our student body elections. As a greek, I see firsthand how organizing voting perverts the process.

I was wondering if the women on campus knew that smoking was the least attractive thing they could possibly do.

Twenty-three comments in one day's Campus Fourum. That's some good work, Collegian.

Somebody get Tom Asbury a muzzle.

First the players suck. Then the coaches suck. What's next — the officiating?

Tom Asbury is getting really good at passing the buck. I think it's about time he took a long look in the mirror.

I've always been very upset about having to pay money for my transcript, especially when they upped the charge to five bucks. I think that's a service that should be placed on KATS. That would make it a lot easier for all of us.

Now that all that snow's melted off the trees, I think I'm going to go cut me one down out of somebody's yard.

I would really like to say that I am just really, really missing my Cherry Coke.

Dear Collegian, representatives of the residence halls just voted this evening to make the residence halls smoke-free in two years. Where were you? I thought you covered the news.

This is for the people who love Joe Leonard. He is showing us he cares — by staying on the bench.

If the Collegian dropped the Campus Fourum, I would never read the paper.

I'd like to ask Jason Heinrich and the student council which will kill you quicker — second-hand smoke, unprotected sex or a student driving behind the wheel drunk?

I want to see the men's basketball team beat Colorado this weekend. Go get 'em, guys.

Kreem Kup's no secret to me. I can thank it for my freshman 15.

Dave Levin's Thursday column ruled, especially the part about lard-butts.

I would just like to commend the Association of Residence Halls for last night voting to make all of the residence halls on campus smoke-free.

I have a question for those who don't like second-hand smoke at the bars. Do they actually go to the bars to increase their healthiness?

I personally think that the music that K-Rock is playing is a heckuva lot better than it used to be — and a lot more. Who needs DJs, anyway?

How lucky am I? Monday — order a futon. Tuesday — futon store burns down. Thursday — no futon.

Hey, Bill Snyder, why don't you try recruiting some Kansas boys for once. This is Kansas State, you know.

Snyder, way to go. K-State landed the fortieth-best recruiting class in the nation. You'd better look out now, UTEP.

I'd just like to know who hired David Levin, because that guy should be fired.

Identity crisis

Being politically correct corrupts unity of once-strong American society

"I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America and to the republic for which it stands. One nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all." For those of you who might have forgotten, those are the words to the Pledge of Allegiance. Unfortunately, some people have not recited these words since elementary school, if at all, because of the political incorrectness of the word God. Many others simply do not possess the national patriotism required to recite it, largely because of the absence of a uniform American identity.

VIEWPOINT

Political correctness, in theory, means giving people their space and encouraging a range of opinions and lifestyles. In practice, however, it means continually alternating between prissy self-censorship and cultural bum-kissing. Regrettably, political correctness — as well as affirmative action — has become an invaluable tool used in the war against inequality and differentiation. Sadly, political correctness has caused differentiation to spread like a noxious weed that now has a chokehold on our society.

But what is differentiation, anyway? According to Merriam-Webster's Collegiate Dictionary, differentiation is the development from the one to the many. Instead of focusing on what the members of particular group might have in common, it focuses upon what they do not. Put simply, differentiation is dividing a given society based upon social issues such as religion, race or ethnicity.

An unfortunate side effect of differentiation is it often causes a lack of unity among the members within a given society to develop. This problem is only amplified by the excessive use of political correctness and the reverse-discriminatory habits of affirmative action.

In the United States, this lethal combination has resulted in the creation of uniquely American terminology. This new terminology combines the ethnic origin of an individual with that of being American. As a result, we now have terms such as African-American, Japanese-American and Mexican-American. These new terms not only have made the already visible social divisions within our society even more apparent, but they also have resulted in the loss of a common American identity.

Without a common American identity, the United States has become little more than a conglomeration of separate and different social groups. As each group becomes more and more self-sufficient, more ties are broken with the rest of society, resulting in self-segregation. As fewer and fewer threads remain to hold together our increasingly fragile society, the less we look like a patchwork quilt and the more we begin to look like a mosaic, held together only by our proximity to one another. Somehow I do not believe this current movement is what our founding fathers meant by forming "a more perfect Union." By separating and segregating ourselves from one another based solely upon our ancestry, we no longer can consider ourselves "We the People of the United States" because there is no "we." Sadly, the only time we seem to set aside our differences and come together as one unanimous voice is in times of extreme crisis, such as Operation Desert Storm and the bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building.

We call ourselves Americans, but the truth is most of us do not know what it means to be an American. We get so wrapped up in our insignificant daily lives that we forget just how lucky and how much better off we are by just being here. Every year, thousands of people come to the United States yearning to breathe free as we do, and every single one of them is more than honored to be called an American. Shouldn't we?

Everyone can afford to give, help others, regardless of financial situations

VIEWPOINT

ERIN SCHNEWEIS

To some it might appear to be just a ring.

A ring not from a fancy diamond store, and not even a ring that you could have appraised.

It is instead a ring that was purchased from a quarter machine. Twenty-five cents, and it is absolutely priceless.

One of my roommates is involved with Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc. On a weekly basis, we get visited by two extremely sweet boys.

The boys don't have brand new clothes or even the latest toys. But these boys have big hearts and serve as a constant reminder — a reminder of what is important.

The boys' uncle recently gave them $1. They could have bought gum, candy or even another game at the local arcade. Instead, they took their dollar and chose to buy my roommates and me jewelry.

When I found the ring in front of my bedroom door with a sweet note attached, I quickly excused myself. Inside my room, I held the ring, and my eyes filled with tears.

Minutes before, I had been upset that I didn't have enough money to buy a new compact disc or even the boots that I've had my eye on.

Yet I have hundreds of CDs and more than 50 pairs of shoes.

As I walked around my room, I looked at pictures of my loved ones on my wall. It made me think of all the times when others have given to me, unselfishly and unconditionally. I have been given things, tokens, gifts for no reason other than just to give, gifts that held no hidden agendas.

I thought of the girl who gave me the pink and white friendship bracelet at a camp for people with disabilities I volunteered at a few years ago. I hang the bracelet on my rearview mirror due to fear of losing it if I wear it around my wrist. The gift was given to me by a girl who was expected to have only a few years left to live, someone who had every reason to hate the world, but instead chose to embrace it.

Pictures of my family were on the wall. I smiled and thought of all of those times when my parents have done without for me. They have done without the luxuries and without always having the best. They always got their meals last, after ensuring that my three older brothers and I had enough to eat.

Pictures of my roommates caught my eye next. These are girls who let me eat their meals with them when I had no money for food. These girls would do anything for me and vice versa.

Yet money is not necessarily the full extent of giving.

People give their shoulders for friends to lean on. Relationships require people to give their hearts to in which to confide.

Life should be more a matter of giving rather than taking.

Even if you have been hurt in the past, even if you feel like you have been ripped apart in every direction and don't feel like giving, that is the time when you should give the most.

You can give people pieces of yourself — pieces of your smile, of your heart and of your life. But don't do it as an expectation of how you will benefit from it.

I hope someday I can be like those two little boys who gave up their $1 to buy jewelry. Those boys who give themselves with every hug, every laugh and two hours a week. Those boys who have so much more than those with the new clothes and trendy toys.

ROTC provides opportunity to combine class, hands-on experience

Have you ever wondered what those guys running around in their Army uniforms each week are doing?

Why do they wear uniforms? What do they do that is different from what I do?

I will attempt to answer questions and clarify misperceptions about Army ROTC.

The Department of Military Science is one of the nation's oldest — dating back to 1863. At that time, a student with previous military experience supervised all military training.

Those classes were electives until 1894, when the Kansas Board of Regents made military training mandatory for all able-bodied freshman and sophomore male students.

In 1919, the Army Reserve Officers' Training Corps officially was activated at K-State. Mandatory enrollment in this program continued until the 1965-66 school year. In fall 1973, the ROTC program was opened to women for the first time.

Twenty women enrolled that fall and became eligible for a commission into the U.S. Army.

Army ROTC is now an elective class that combines classroom time with hands-on experience to teach leadership and management skills.

Many of these skills can be used in both military and civilian settings. As an elective, students can try it for up to two years without ever making a commitment to the Army.

Army ROTC also offers many other opportunities for fun training, including Airborne School, Air Assault School and Northern Warfare School.

ROTC meets for class one to three times a week, depending on the class, and on Wednesdays members wear battle-dress uniforms to class.

In addition, the group meets for leadership labs one Saturday a month for eight hours. These are fun and challenging activities where members practice skills learned in the classroom and try new things.

The first lab this semester is Feb. 19. ROTC will travel to Fort Riley, where the advanced cadets will practice map reading and land navigation, while the remaining cadets practice rappelling from towers.

This will be a lot of fun and a great test of skill and confidence.

Anyone is welcome to visit the Military Science Hall with questions about how to join the ranks or to find out more about ROTC and what the group stands for.

READERS write

Club sports should have priority over intramurals

Editor,

I am writing to discuss an injustice provided by K-State Recreation Services.

For the past three weeks, the K-State club soccer team has been practicing and preparing for a state-wide tournament in Kansas City this weekend. The winner qualifies for a national tournament.

We have practiced quietly in the smaller gym at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. Our practices usually run from 4:30 to 6 p.m. Not until Monday had we been asked to leave to let people play basketball. The request was, in my mind, a joke.

I thought it was a joke for two reasons. First, that Rec Services would ask someone to stop playing so others could practice and, second, that intramural sports have priority over a club team is sad. I don't understand how the club team, who will represent the school this weekend, can be told not to practice so other students can practice for intramurals.

I think there are enough basketball courts reserved for pick-up games and intramural sports. I don't believe that it is that hard for Rec Services to reserve the small gym until after the tournament and without requesting money.

Rights of non-smokers should be acknowledged

Editor,

I am writing regarding the article "Resolution concerning smoking to be introduced to Student Senate" and the Editorial Board's opinion on the subject.

I have been a resident of California before, during and after the whole ordeal with the smoking ban. I also shared your opinion on the subject.

Really, who are we to say someone cannot smoke in a public place?

However, the smoke in a bar is so much more dense than in the open air that it is almost as if a non-smoker were smoking.

These truly are two valid points. But on the side of the non-smoker, I ask, have you ever woke up the next morning smelling of smoke, gotten burned by a cigarette or finally washed out that sweater to find the water black with soot, when you don't even smoke? It is absolutely disgusting.

There are bars in California that you can smoke at. The owner pays the fine. The non-smoker now has a choice though.

I hope people would think of this not as smokers losing their rights, but as a non-smoker finally being given his rights to be a non-smoker.

Social Security numbers used as ID irresponsible

Editor,

I have become concerned with K-State's willingness to display our personal information on the Internet and their reckless treatment of our Social Security numbers.

One can find a lot about a person just by checking out K-State's online directory.

This information includes your name, permanent address and phone number, local address and phone number, major, year in school and campus employment information.

In the wrong hands, our information can be used against us, not just by stalkers but also by identity robbers and telemarketers. All K-State needs to do is provide your Social Security number, and a person could do just about anything they want to you.

When it comes to following laws that govern the use and protection of our Social Security numbers, K-State is severely lacking.

Schools that receive federal funding must comply with the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act in order to retain their funding.

One of FERPA's provisions requires written consent for the release of educational records or personally identifiable information. The courts have stated that Social Security numbers fall within this provision.

FERPA applies to state colleges, universities and technical schools that receive federal funding.

This prevents schools from displaying a student's Social Security numbers on identification cards and distributing or posting class rosters or grades containing Social Security numbers.

This would be a release of personally identifiable information, violating FERPA.

Many of us have had the experience of having our grades posted by our Social Security numbers. This is a violation of the above law.

I have a couple of recommendations for K-State in these matters. First, post only a student's local information and e-mail address. By far, out of all the university directories I visited, we give out the most information.

Second, tell all faculty members that grades cannot be posted by our Social Security numbers and enforce it by simply taking a walk through our academic buildings.

Third, starting with next year's incoming students, issue their student IDs with a randomly generated nine- to 10-digit number.

By taking steps to ensure the absolute security of our information K-State can take the lead in protecting their students and their information in the digital age.

Volleyball team signs 4 recruits

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State volleyball program took another step toward the top Thursday when head coach Jim McLaughlin announced the signing of four players to the program.

McLaughlin said he is pleased with the class and the program's recruiting.

"I think everything helped us — the direction of the program, the staff, Dr. (Jon) Wefald and Max Urlick, it all helped," McLaughlin said. "What we can offer is a great education and we can train them at the highest level. We think we have a package that is better than anywhere else."

The recruiting class included Cari and Kris Jensen, the first set of twins ever to sign with the program. Cari Jensen is an outside hitter who has helped lead Fowler High School in Colorado to three straight 2A state titles.

Kris Jensen was named to the all-state first team by the Rocky Mountain News.

Another of the team's recruits is Lisa Martin, a 6-foot outside/middle hitter from Hutchinson, Kan. In high school, she helped guide Hutchinson High School to a 72-30 record.

McLaughlin rounded out his recruiting with Lauren Goehring, another 6-foot player who has played on the U.S. Youth 17-under National Olympic Team. She was one of the most heavily recruited players in the country.

McLaughlin said the program has a set way of recruiting.

"We had a talent pool of 322 kids, and we narrowed it down to 10, and of the 10 we narrowed it down to four. We got the four we wanted. It's hard, but you have to do your homework and you have to really study it. We look at athletic ability. You also look at character, and you look at competitiveness. You try to measure that on what we see the kids do."

He also said a key in recruiting is to listen to what a player's goals are.

"A lot of listening to the player and what her objectives are — what does she want to do with her career? We think we can train a volleyball player here better than anywhere else in the country," he said.

McLaughlin said it is hard to judge the effect this class will have on the team that finished fourth in the Big 12 and had its first All-American selection in Dawn Cady.

"After signing a class like we signed yesterday, we are pretty excited about what is going to happen. I think this recruiting class upgrades us, and I think it has an element of speed that helps — and how much it helps us we will see."

A little more than six months away from the start of fall practice, McLaughlin said he is looking forward to next year.

"We only lose one starter, but these kids are physically enough and athletic enough that if they can get the demands of our system, then I think they are going to be pretty good. You just never know."

Recruiting class worthy of praise; don't forget holdovers of last year

You might have noticed some friends or classmates who have lacked a certain amount of energy or pulse since the spring semester began. There's a simple solution to this: Let them know it's football season. They can come off of life support now.

Sure, it's been an arduous 34 days of bread-and-water college basketball since K-State football last surfaced in San Diego, but the magic's back. Wednesday's glorious spectacle known as signing day has ushered in a new era of Wildcat football, with the addition of 18 newcomers to the Powercat posse. And this is only the beginning.

The event that used to notify Wagner Field fans that it's safe to crawl out from under their purple-lined RVs was the spring purple and white game, but let's be realistic. K-State has become a football school, and any devout fan knows the countdown to next season begins when a promising high school senior or community college product puts the pen to the paper.

The buzz surrounding head coach Bill Snyder's class of 2000 is inconceivable. 6-foot, 200-pound quarterback Will Martin has already been dubbed "the next Michael Bishop" without so much as a snap in practice being registered. Punter Jared Brite, who may be a bigger plus for baseball coach Mike Clark (Brite's fastball has been clocked at 95 mph), is expected to solve the problems that plagued K-State's revolving door of punters last season. Even running back Josh Scobey is expected to live up to the legend of, well, Josh Scobey, which began with a school-record 1,819 yards rushing and 21 touchdowns at Del City High School in Oklahoma and carried over to a second-team All-America pick at Northeastern A&M Community College last season.

There are others who deserve some ink, but just as the above three will find out, the class of 2000 won't leave a lasting impression until they earn a ticket from summer two-a-days to playing time on Saturdays. This shouldn't be a problem for some of the class. Despite the excess of hype surrounding them, this class is the real deal (all apologies to Greg Hill, the former holder of this title).

Still, fans shouldn't get too caught up in Snyder's recruiting bounty. There are still plenty of holdouts from the class of 1999 who will make just as big a splash in the fall.

Ell Roberson's the obvious choice, and deservedly so. The quarterback from Baytown, Texas, should give incumbent Jonathan Beasley a run for the starting spot. Even if he doesn't win the position outright, Roberson will serve as a valuable backup to Beasley and continue to mature in K-State's complex offense.

There's more, though, starting with the brothers Rashad. Wichita products Rashad Jackson and Rashad Washington should prove worth the wait. Jackson, a 5-foot-9-inch standout for Wichita High School Northwest as a running back, might factor in elsewhere, but Washington should remain at his natural position of tailback. A USA Today honorable mention All-USA pick at Wichita High School Southeast, the 6-foot-4-inch, 210-pound Washington is built in the Frank Murphy frame. Likewise, Washington possesses both strength and speed that can burn coverage as a receiving back. Washington could be the wildcard offensive coordinator Ron Hudson needs to complement returning starter David Allen and Scobey.

Finally, opportunities abound for offensive linemen Oshin Honarchian and Matt Martin. Both community-college transfers who sat out the 1999 season, Honarchian and Martin will be in the thick of the competition to replace seniors Damion McIntosh and Ian Moses on the line.

The holdouts of 1999, along with the new class, could establish a reputation similar to that of Mario Fatafehi, Joe Hall and Cliff Holloman, all products of last season's crop of recruits. At this point though, all the praise and analysis Rivals100 recruiting guru Jeremy Crabtree can dish out doesn't mean jack without actual production at the collegiate level.

Snyder has proven himself over the years as a talented miner of both high school and junior college, however. Bishop and Mark Simoneau testify to this. With that track record backing recruiting classes that continue to rise in national rank, there's no reason to doubt that the new season will feature a successful fusion of veteran players and two "new" classes of high-profile recruits.

Cats reach scholarship limit with 18 more players

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It had to happen sometime.

Thanks to the 18 players who signed letters of intent to play football for K-State on Wednesday, head coach Bill Snyder has reached the NCAA limit of 85 scholarship players for the first time.

"We have never been fully scholarshiped, but I don't know if this will turn out to be the exception to the rule or not," Snyder said. "As we speak today, we have 85 scholarship players. Tomorrow it might be different."

With the exception of fullback, K-State addressed every other position with at least one signee for the 2000 class.

"I don't think there was a favorite priority for us," Snyder said. "I think if there had been one where I would stand up and say this is where we would put most of our marbles, it might have been a fullback — and if that was the case, we failed in that respect."

One area the Wildcats did not fail in, at least from a numbers standpoint, was on the offensive and defensive line. Of the 18 players who signed with K-State, eight play a position on the line. The highlight of the line prospects is Chris Boggas, a 6-foot-5-inch, 315-pound offensive lineman who was considered by several recruiting experts to be among the top offensive linemen in the nation.

"Anytime that you can get linemen, offensively or defensively, they are always a premium," Snyder said. "Could I tell you that we would have taken as many at the outset of the recruiting process? We did not earmark that many."

A late addition to the recruiting list of players for K-State was Clarksville, Tenn., standout Will Martin, a 6-foot, 195-pound quarterback who has become the latest player to be tabbed "the next Michael Bishop."

Snyder said he first heard Martin's name only two weeks ago, and that he liked what he saw on game tape of the signal caller.

"He's a very athletic guy that does what we do," Snyder said. "He's got a good arm, he's got a strong arm, he throws accurately, he can run the football — he does a little bit of all of it."

Noticeably absent from the signee list was any player from the state of Kansas. Last year, five players from Kansas committed to play for K-State, but Snyder said the talent level fluctuates every year in the state.

"I don't think we recruited as well in the state this year as we should have," Snyder said. "There were youngsters that we didn't get, that we did recruit."

Snyder said he expects to have between eight and 12 recruited walk-on players for next year, with most of those coming from Kansas.

In other football news: ■ K-State's leading rusher from last season, Joe Hall, still is not attending classes.

"He is making every effort to further his education and gain his eligibility," Snyder said.

When asked if Hall would be in school this summer, Snyder said, "I would like to think that would be the case."

■ K-State is talking with the University of Southern California about a home-and-home series to begin in 2001, but talks still are ongoing. The schedule for next season still is not set in stone, either.

K-State would like to play Louisiana Tech on Sept. 23, which means that North Texas, which is scheduled to play K-State on that day, would have to switch and play K-State on Sept. 9 and Texas Tech on Sept. 23. If that does not work out, K-State will play Division I-AA Massachusetts on Sept. 9.

Tennis team to compete against Creighton on unusual Manhattan home court

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis team will test the novel concept of a home opener away from home this weekend when they take on the Creighton Blue Jays at 3 p.m. Saturday.

The match will be played not at the usual venue of Ahearn Field House but at the Cottonwood Racquet Club here in Manhattan, due to scheduling conflicts with a track and field meet.

Head coach Steve Bietau said although playing away from Ahearn might chip away slightly at the home-court advantage, the Cottonwood Club was a suitable replacement.

"I think when we go in the field house, because it's probably less of the norm that we play on, we might have more of an advantage in there," he said. "The field house is a rather unique place. Cottonwood is more of the typical indoor situation we play in."

Junior Anna Pampoulova said although the team would miss its customary home, matches somewhere in Manhattan were a welcome change after beginning the season with a grueling, four-game road swing.

"It's too bad that we can't play in Ahearn, because we really like Ahearn, but we like playing at home," Pampoulova said. "I guess we're more familiar with the atmosphere and everything."

In the new surroundings of the Cottonwood Club, the Wildcats (2-2) will look to move above .500 for the first time this season.

The Cats will not know quite what to expect from their opponents until they take the court Saturday, because Creighton hasn't yet played a match in spring tennis. However, Bietau recalled being impressed with the Jays' doubles prowess when they visited for the K-State Doubles Invitational in the fall.

"The strength of their lineup is in doubles," Bietau said. "They're well-trained there, and they play smart."

Leading the Cats into doubles action will be the No. 1 tandem of Pampoulova and Alena Jecminkova, who have won two of their last three matches. Bietau said Creighton could be something of a turning point for the duo, who enter Saturday with a 2-2 record.

"Clearly they can play better than they have, and this would be a good place to start," Bietau said. "If they do that, they probably take care of winning against Creighton, and also take care of some more pressing needs as the season goes on."

Fans might not be surprised by a slow K-State start on Saturday. The "Cardiac Cats" opened the season with a come-from-behind win and close loss, respectively, in opening the season against San Diego and New Mexico.

They come into this weekend's matchup having survived a closer-than-it-sounds 9-0 win over Southwest Missouri State last weekend. The Wildcats have spent plenty of time living on the edge this season, but Bietau said that may not be a bad thing.

"It doesn't concern me at this point, because I don't think any of the struggles in the beginning were something that would be unexpected," he said. "I actually viewed it more as a normal start to the matches, and then lifting their level of play as the match went on. It really is more of a positive thing from my standpoint."

Baseball team begins season in New Mexico

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State baseball team will begin its 2000 season in much the same fashion as it played a majority of the 1999 season — on the road.

The Wildcats are in Albuquerque, N.M., this weekend to play three games in the Spalding Fiesta Tournament, a showdown of sorts between the Big 12 Conference and the Pac-10 conference. The tournament also features Washington State and Oregon State, in addition to fellow conference member Texas A&M.

K-State returns only 13 players from last year's squad and is especially lacking in experience from the mound, with only three of the 13 pitchers on the team having Division I experience.

"That's a concern, but we like the arms," K-State head baseball coach Mike Clark said. "We're just going to have to put them out there and see what they can do."

Expected to start the first game against Oregon State today at 10:30 a.m. is senior Jason Wells, who got the victory in last year's 7-6 win against the Oregon State Beavers. Sophomore community college transfer Luke Robertson and true freshman Derek Ver Helst will start the other two games over the weekend.

Expected to start in the infield for the Wildcats are junior first baseman Mark English, senior second baseman Chad Tabor, junior shortstop J.D. Loudabarger and senior third baseman Travis Andre'.

The outfield is less stable with junior Kasey Weishaar the only returning regular starter in left field. Clark said he would feel comfortable putting any of his outfielders in the starting lineup.

Those players are true freshmen Joey Ammirato, community-college transfers Kelvin Day and Chris Nelson, junior Ben Oleen and sophomore Collin Yoachim.

The Cats will play two of the three games against Oregon State, with whom K-State went 1-1 with last year. The Beavers finished last season 19-35 overall and in eighth place in the Pac-10 and, much like K-State, will incorporate 21 new players into the system.

Washington State has a record of 0-1 this season after finishing last year with a 24-31 record, good enough for ninth place in the Pac-10. The Cougars have 13 seniors on their squad, paced by preseason All-American outfielder Jason Grove.

K-State returns to Manhattan next weekend to play Doane on Feb. 12, its first-ever game at newly renovated Frank Myers Field.

Cats meet Missouri hungry for revenge

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team is hungry for a win.

Recently, the team has suffered some difficult losses, and head coach Deb Patterson said the team is looking for a victory.

If the Cats (9-12 overall, 2-6 Big 12) are win hungry, then they have been on a starvation diet lately, losing their past four contests.

They will try to reverse their fortunes against a Missouri team (12-6, 2-5) in a similar position at 1 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

"This is a game where two teams hit the floor, both believing they can beat the other team," Patterson said. "And it's going to be a neat test to see who gets the job done, and I expect it to be us."

Not only will K-State have to overcome the losing streak, but their previous game against the Tigers, a 52-63 loss that included 30 K-State turnovers, also will be fresh in their minds.

"The second half against Missouri, I just felt we really fell apart and just didn't compete the last 20 minutes," Patterson said. "I thought they really played with great intensity and pressured the ball in the full court, and I expect them to come in here Saturday starting the game like they ended the game at Missouri."

In Columbia, K-State's perimeter players struggled with the intense man pressure applied by the Tigers, and as a result the Cats struggled to put points on the board. Since the Missouri game, the Cats have reduced their miscues against pressure defenses like Iowa State and Nebraska, but Patterson still sees ball handling as the key to the game.

"In game one, they won the game because we didn't handle the pressure," Patterson said.

Part of the reason for the Cats' 30 turnovers in Columbia was the large size advantage. Only one Missouri starter stands less than 5 feet 10 inches tall, so when shorter guards like April Sailors and Kim Woodlee were trapped, the result was almost women's notebook

Game Time

The Cats (9-12 overall, 2-6 Big 12) will tip off against Missouri (12-6, 2-5) at 1 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

Switching Starters

K-State has used three different lineups in the last three games. A starting position has not necessarily translated into minutes, however. Against Nebraska, junior forward Marshela Webb got her first start of the year but only played the first three minutes of the game.

A Cold January

The Cats struggled in the month of January, compiling only a 2-6 record, their worst record for the month since 1988.

Mounting Records

Senior forward Nicky Ramage needs 10 points to join the 1,000-point club. Against Nebraska, Ramage joined the 500-rebound ranks by grabbing rebound No. 502.

— compiled by Michael Noll an automatic turnover.

"If we're going to be effective, we need to space the floor well, we have to keep the dribble and we need to reverse the ball," Patterson said. "If you pull up the dribble, you are a dead duck."

Also in game one, the Tiger post players had big games. Senior forward Amy Monsees scored 18 points and junior center Amanda Lassiter chalked up 13 points.

Patterson said defense would be a key in this game, especially after the Cats gave up 26 points to Nebraska guard Nicole Kubik last Sunday.

"In the Nebraska game in the second half, our defense slipped," Patterson said. "And we're going to have to defend very well against Missouri to stay in the game, because that frontline of theirs is very athletic and can hurt you inside and out."

K-State counting on home game to end losing streak

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three wins.

That's the combined total of the K-State Wildcats and Colorado Buffaloes' wins in Big 12 Conference play thus far.

Saturday, when the two schools meet at 7 p.m. in Bramlage Coliseum, both teams will be looking to end losing streaks.

For the Cats (8-11, 1-7), the streak has ballooned to seven, while the Buffs (11-9, 2-6) have lost their past three.

Assistant coach Mark Fox said playing at home couldn't come at a better time for the struggling Cats.

"We're happy to be home again," Fox said. "We certainly need a win, and hopefully it should be easy on our home floor. We can only control certain things. We can't control injuries or the way the ball bounces."

"If we take care of today, tomorrow will take care of itself."

At one point this season, injuries knocked senior forward/guard Josh Reid and sophomore forward Travis Reynolds from the starting lineup.

Reynolds since has returned to action, and Reid came off the bench against Iowa State on Wednesday for the first time since breaking his right foot in practice prior to K-State's Dec. 22 win against Old Dominion.

Fox said it will be a while until Reid is up to full speed.

"It's going to be a while till we see the old Josh Reid that has played well for us," Fox said. "Just his knowledge of the offense and having some poise has been greatly missed. And I think that's an area that we can improve in right now."

In K-State's 78-70 loss to Colorado on Jan. 22 in Boulder, the Cats outshot the Buffs from the field, making 44 percent of their shots to 41 percent for Colorado. What proved to be the difference in the game was the free-throw shooting, one aspect of the game that K-State has struggled with throughout the season. K-State was a mere five of 10 from the line, while the Buffs were 24 of 32.

In fact, K-State's conference opponents have gone to the line 111 more times than the Cats. On three occasions this season, the Cats have been outscored by 18 points or more from the charity stripe.

"We've put teams on the free-throw line too much and we're not getting to the line enough," Fox said. "We can't give people more fouls shots than we do. That was the difference in the game, last time we played them."

In order to stop the bleeding, the Cats will have to stop the Buffaloes' senior guard Jaquay Walls, who poured in 32 points against K-State earlier in the season. Actually, Walls himself was 14 of 17 from the line.

Fox said containing Walls rolls right back to the free-throw woes.

"We have to keep Walls off the line," Fox said. "He went to the line more than our team did. You can't do that if you want to win. That was the difference."

Walls' team-leading 16.6 points per game isn't the only threat that could send K-State flying towards its eighth loss in a row.

Junior forward Jamahl Mosley brings a 12.7 points-per-game average into the contest as well as 7.2 rebounds. Freshman forward Richard Fox also gives the Buffaloes an inside presence with 8.8 points and 7.3 boards per game.

K-State senior forward Tony Kitt, who entered Wednesday's game averaging a double-double with 13 points and 10.1 rebounds per game, was held to a minimum against the Cyclones. Kitt managed just three boards and 7 points.

Fox said against Colorado, a team that rebounds the ball well, K-State will need a team effort on the boards.

"Tony didn't play well last night, but it's not just his responsibility either," Fox said. "We need a total team effort in there. We do need to cut down on turnovers in the post and make sure they get the ball."

STORY BY AMY CUNNINGHAM

Jewelers offer suggestions when searching for engagement rings

It's time to make the commitment. You need a ring.

Much like buying a car or a house, an engagement ring is a significant purchase.

Dave Thomas, owner of G. Thomas Jewelers, emphasized the importance of finding the right ring. He said men should pay particular attention to what catches the woman's eye.

"She has to like it," Thomas said. "That has to be your primary concern."

Thomas said the next step is to set a realistic budget. Most stores allow you to put a percentage down and then make monthly payments.

Finding a store with a good reputation is essential when shopping for fine jewelry, Thomas said. The reduced prices at jewelry sales, unfortunately, might be too good to be true.

"Find a family-owned, family-operated shop that has been in business for a number of years. Go into the store, look at the quality of the store. Does it look like a store that you feel comfortable in and that you would possibly like to make a purchase at? Then ask, 'Do you have any jewelers that work right here in this store?'" Thomas said. "A store that is in this business to be in this business will make the investment to hire a good jeweler."

Another way to find a quality jewelry retailer is to look for ones registered with national organizations within the industry.

"An American Gem Society Store will have a registered jeweler who has to go to school to be qualified," said Charles Elliott, owner of Reed and Elliott Jewelers. "When he sizes a ring, you shouldn't even be able to see where the ring was sized."

Elliott said it is important to become educated about jewelry. He said learn the four C's: cut, color, clarity and carat. Carat is a measure of the weight of a diamond. There are 100 points in a carat. A half carat means a diamond has 50 points.

Clarity refers to the degree of flaws in a diamond.

Color, in diamonds, is rated on a letter scale from D, perfectly colorless, to Z, the lowest color rating.

Cut allows a diamond to glimmer and sparkle. A well-cut diamond lets light into the stone and reflects the light outward from the top of the diamond. If light is reflected from the bottom or the sides of the stone, the cut is wrong.

"Ask to see a diamond under a binocular microscope," Elliott said. "Cut, color and clarity are the most important factors. Size is not the way to find a diamond. Look for craftsmanship in the jewelry — it's the painstaking care to see that everything is well done."

Although diamonds are the most popular stone found in engagement rings, it is not uncommon to incorporate other stones, Mark Claussen, owner of Claussen's Custom Design and Repair, said.

"I've done all kinds," Claussen said. "Rubies. Emeralds. Sapphires. I've done some unique ones with black opals and pearls."

Claussen said shopping for jewelry can be a bit overwhelming, especially if you don't know where to start. Making an informed decision can help to ease any apprehension.

"I would suggest going to all the businesses around. There is a lot of variety out there," Claussen said. "Know what you want before you buy it."

career highlights

Performance to showcase Andrew Lloyd Webber's 20-year musical career on Broadway

He has been writing some of the most famous Broadway music for almost 20 years. Broadway composer Andrew Lloyd Webber is having his diverse career showcased in a compilation of his musical blockbusters at 7 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

"The Music of Sir Andrew Lloyd Webber" highlights Webber's 20-year musical career on Broadway. Webber has set many records and become a Tony, Grammy and Academy Award-winning composer.

Daniel Bee, spokesman for Webber, said he thought the performance was a great idea in terms of style and spreading the word.

"It's more of a concert tour, which has been tried and tested since 1988," he said. "It produces a good atmosphere targeted at outlying areas where people may not be able to get to Broadway or the West End."

The professional tour company Troika has created this mix of hits along with British director, Arlene Philips, who previously worked on the production "Lord of the Dance." The group is performing only one night at K-State, followed by performances in Kansas City, Mo., and Wichita.

Marketing manager Marci Thompson said the tour runs from September to April and has many productions.

"We like different venues where we can provide entertaining and well-produced, medium-sized shows," she said.

The concert will contain two acts with songs from musicals such as "The Phantom of the Opera," "Cats," "Evita" and many more. Included is a wide variety of hits celebrating and highlighting the best performances of Webber's work.

Thom Jackson, McCain marketing and development officer, said the show will be an affordable combination of some popular musicals.

"It's expensive to see all his musicals, and most people haven't got the money, and it's not feasible," he said. "Instead, this enables you to get a feel for all of them through the highlights."

Todd Wyant, assistant director of the Athletic Learning Center, said he is looking forward to the production.

"I'm anxious to see what the performance will consist of and how they will interpret the collection. I've already seen three of the musicals live," he said. "I'm particularly interested in 'Phantom of the Opera' and how they handle the costume changes."

"The Music of Andrew Lloyd Webber" is part of the McCain Performance Series. The show is sponsored by Kansas Farm Bureau, Kansas Arts Commission, the National Endowment for the Arts and K-State arts fees.

Cowboy humorist to perform Saturday in McCain

By SHANNON DELMEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

K-State students will be able to see Baxter Black, the cowboy humorist, for the fourth time. He will perform at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

"He'll tell stories about cowboys," Steve Frazier, rodeo coach, said. "He'll go through the motions of cowboys' facial expressions like Red Skelton. There are just a number of different things that he will do to make you laugh and laugh with him. He can construe his face in more precarious situations than any other person I probably know. Baxter is known for the same type of things as Red Skelton."

Black said the material for his show comes from his background and relates to the audiences he is addressing.

Black is a former veterinarian from Arizona. He said he considers himself an agriculture and livestock person.

"Of course that has appeal to people in Kansas and a lot of people who go to Kansas State, because it's a big ag school and also a big veterinary school," he said.

Black has been performing live since 1982 after spending 13 years as a veterinarian. He said entertaining was something he did as a hobby, for fun or to entertain his friends. When he retired from his veterinary work, his hobby became a successful career.

"We call it cowboy poetry, but it's just stories about animals and the people who care for them — the livestock people and the people of the land," Black said. "I tell them jokes about themselves. I call it cowboy stuff. Kansas has a lot of farmers as well. They may not think of themselves as cowboys, but they're certainly livestock people."

Black also does a number of commercials for various companies including Las Vegas casinos, salsa companies and catfish companies. He said sometimes he takes the commercials provided by the companies and sometimes he writes the commercials himself.

Black has a weekly syndicated column that he does for 130 agricultural trade and small-town papers. His column is always humorous, occasionally political and accidentally informative," he said.

"I tell people that it is mostly humorous, occasionally political and accidentally informative," he said.

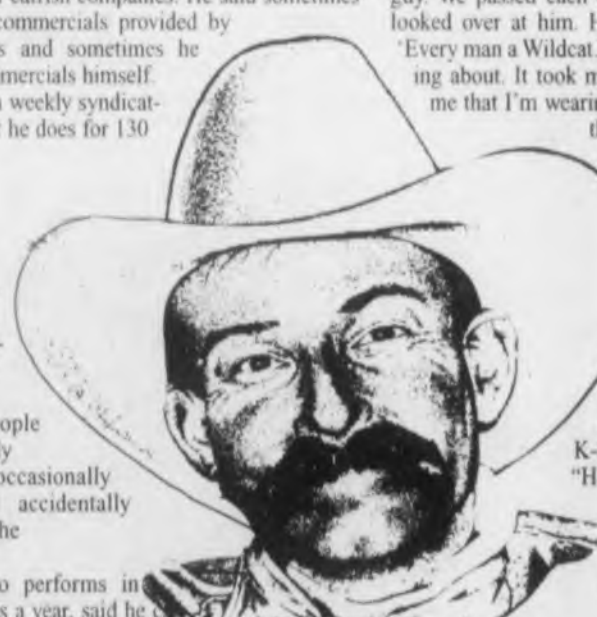

Black, who performs in about 70 shows a year, said he remembered the gift he received from the Rodeo Club the last time he was at K-State.

"Two years ago when I was there, the Rodeo Club gave me this nice jacket," he said. "It had 'Kansas State Rodeo Team' on the back. I'm walking through the airport one time wearing that jacket, and I walk by this guy. We passed each other, he caught my eye and I looked over at him. He winked at me, and he said, 'Every man a Wildcat.' I had no idea what he was talking about. It took months but it finally dawned on me that I'm wearing this Kansas State jacket, and that's what that was all about."

Frazier said tickets for Black's Rodeo Club-sponsored show are going fast. They can be purchased for $15 for orchestra seats and $12 for balcony seats. Frazier encouraged students to attend the show, which he expects to sell out, just like previous shows Black has performed at K-State.

"He's always been a storyteller. He started back in the school days," Frazier said. "Come out for an hour and a half of gut-wrenching humor. Once they see him, they'll want to come see him again."

New living quarters at Fort Riley provide comfortable living $51.5 million barracks renewal program could improve soldier morale.

By CHRISTIE VANOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There's a new residence hall of sorts in Riley County. But it isn't on the K-State campus, and it doesn't house students.

The new barracks at Fort Riley were ready for soldiers to move in on Jan. 31.

Both soldiers and students begin as high school graduates looking for a future. Some choose higher education, while others choose the opportunities available through the Army.

Either way, both move away from the traditional comforts of home.

More than 3,700 K-State students choose to live on campus in residence halls, and about the same number of Fort Riley soldiers live in barracks.

"Most of the residence halls are traditional double-loaded corridors with two people per room and a community bathroom," said Skyler Harper, assistant director for Department of Housing and Dining Services. "But, we also have suites in five of our residence halls."

Most Fort Riley soldiers live in the same conditions.

"We have probably close to 75 percent of our soldiers living in buildings with gang latrines," Mike Goreham, installation master planner, said.

Although the old barracks fit Army standards for years, in 1992, the Army chief of staff set a new standard and initiated the barracks-renewal program, Goreham said.

Fort Riley's recent $51.5 million barracks renewal program includes 552 new living spaces, a dining facility and company operations facilities.

"We completed a project in 1996 which was built to the interim standard, which is a two-man room with two soldiers in the room sharing a small bathroom," Goreham said. "We're now working under the final standards, which is two private rooms that share a bathroom and small service area."

Monday, soldiers of 101st Forward Support Battalion were the first to move in to the new complex.

"We do have a ways to go. But, we're providing quality living space for the soldiers to increase morale and to improve retention."

— Mike Goreham,
installation master planner

Pfc. Jennifer Bettels and her suite mate, Pfc. Kristy Watts, both said they are excited about the move.

"We've hit about every shopping place for decorations like matching towels, soaps and rugs," Bettels said.

Suites in K-State's Van Zile Hall are somewhat similar to the new barracks and other barracks around the country.

"I've been in Hoge barracks at Fort Leavenworth, and I think it's very similar to Van Zile because they both have that hotel-ly but homey feeling," said Karen Gaffin, senior in political science, Spanish and international studies.

"When you walk into Hoge, you're like, 'this is a hotel,' but then you go in the room, and you're like, 'no wait, it's really not.' That's how it is here, too," she said.

With the new barracks comes more responsibility, said Maj. Jim Henderson, executive officer.

"When soldiers move out, it's got to be the way it was, or they're not moving out. That's a big difference for soldiers," he said.

The barracks, like residence halls, have staffed front desks. However, soldiers are not paid as community assistants as the desk staff are paid in the residence halls — it is part of their duty.

"We have a charge of quarters, which is a 24-hour duty for soldiers in the new barracks," Henderson said. "Soldiers are up all night in case there is an alert."

With the completion of this project and the completion of other barracks upgrades, about 40-45 percent of Fort Riley soldiers will live in what are considered adequate barracks, Goreham said.

"We do have a ways to go. But, we're providing quality living space for the soldiers to increase morale and to improve retention," he said.

K-State is also working to improve quality of life for students. Future renovation projects include a new academic center in the Kramer Dining Complex, updating Moore Hall's lobby, adding new suites to unoccupied areas in Boyd Hall and mechanical upgrades throughout the residence halls, Harper said.

Barracks offer privacy, big closets

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT RILEY — Army Pvt. Jaime Ednave took one look in his new quarters and couldn't help grinning. All that privacy. All that space.

Best of all, said the 19-year-old soldier, "I have a big closet."

A big closet? In the Army? Yes, and a private sleeping room, and a kitchenette and bathroom shared with just one other soldier.

More than 500 members of the 1st Brigade, 1st Infantry Division began moving into new quarters that more closely resemble residence halls than the barracks that have been the Army's standard since the Revolutionary War.

At Fort Riley, as on other bases around the country, the Army has been replacing quarters with more attractive digs that officials hope will appeal to today's volunteers.

"The policy is to eliminate gang latrines and open bay showers," said Lester Bergen, who manages the monitoring of the barracks program with the U.S. Department of Army in Alexandria, Va.

"Part of the reason is to encourage soldiers to volunteer and stay in the Army," Bergen said. "They'd be put in barracks with gang latrines and open bay showers and live that way for two or three years."

"If we bring soldiers in — take them through basic training, specialty training and active duty — most of them are about 21 or 22 years old when they get done. They are at a point where they decide to stay or enlist. If you give them quality housing, that may encourage them to stay."

The new housing style results from a directive issued by the Army chief of staff in 1992, when funding started becoming available to remodel existing barracks and build new ones.

The $51.5 million being spent at Fort Riley for the new housing complex also is paying for construction of a new dining facility and the demolition of four barracks that are more than 40 years old.

Fort Riley has about 3,500 soldiers who live in barracks. About 45 percent of them now are lodged in the new housing, and all are expected to be in new accommodations by the time the funding ends in 2008, said Mike Goreham, a civilian who is master planner with the public works department at the post.

"Soldiers are extremely happy at what they're getting," Goreham said. "They're amazed. The old soldiers are going through the barracks saying, 'I didn't get it this good.'"

Pfcs. Jennifer Bettels and Kristy Watts couldn't wait to get started on arranging their quarters.

"We've hit about every store around looking for decorating things," Bettels said.

"This feels more like home," Watts said. "We can do our own dishes in our sinks rather than in the bathroom. We have colored towels, little matching soaps and toothbrush holders and rugs."

Fort Riley is not the only Kansas post getting new living quarters.

McConnell Air Force Base in Wichita also has been updating its facilities. One airman's dormitory was completed in October, and another almost is finished, said Don Beech, McConnell's military construction project manager. The two dormitories will house 228 airmen. Two other older dormitories at McConnell have private living quarters for the airmen.

New U.S. dollar featuring Lewis and Clark's guide available

Wal-Mart, U.S. Mint partner to use new coin.

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Shinier than a penny, bigger than a nickel and more powerful than a quarter — the new U.S. dollar is here, and it's the kind that jingles.

But the U.S. Mint's new "Golden Dollar" coin can't be found in banks. They can be acquired directly through the mint—at www.usmint.gov—or through a promotion with Cheerios cereal. Other than that, the only way Americans in general and Manhattan residents in particular can now get the coin is at a Wal-Mart or a Sam's Club.

The agreement allows the national chain of more than 2,900 stores to give the coins as change.

Jesse Magana, assistant manager for the Manhattan Wal-Mart, said his store has been using the coins since Jan. 27 and the first significant shipment was exhausted by Jan. 31.

"The response has been tremendous," he said.

At this point, Magana said the store is using extra coins given by surrounding stores until the next Feb. 7 shipment. The coins come in rolls of $25, which is also the maximum number anyone can buy at a time, he said.

The coin itself, a copper disk encased by manganese brass, is slightly wider than a quarter, has smooth edges and features Sacagawea on one side and a soaring eagle in addition to 17 stars on the other.

Sacagawea was the Shoshone Indian guide and interpreter who made the 1804-1806 Lewis and Clark expedition possible across the northern Great Plains to the Pacific Ocean. The 17 stars on the other side represent the 17 states in the Union at the time.

The mint's earlier attempt for a mainstream dollar coin bore the image of women's rights activist Susan B. Anthony and ran between 1979 and 1981 plus a final 1999 run. The coin was regarded by many as a failure, primarily because its silver color and ridged edges made it look too much like a quarter.

Magana said the Wal-Mart/U.S. Mint partnership is an unusual one, but the retailer probably was given the coins first to get them used as "real" money. With the golden dollars only available through banks, they might be purchased as collectibles instead of legal tender, he said.

"From what I understand, the treasury department saw Wal-Mart as the fastest way to get it into circulation," he said.

Meanwhile, local banks like the three branches of Commerce Bank are still waiting for their dollars.

Kathy Phillips, teller operations manager for Commerce on Poyntz Avenue, said the Federal Reserve Bank in Kansas City, Mo., has the coins but is keeping area banks on a waiting list. The Reserve usually distributes to larger cities first, but Commerce hopes to get its shipment in approximately three weeks.

Once the shipment reaches the main Poyntz branch, it would be a day or two to distribute to the branch in the K-State Student Union, she said.

Phillips said the bank applied for the maximum amount of $1,000 and an option to reorder, but that is no guarantee it will get them.

Public interest is high, she said. The bank has had so many calls about the golden dollars — 10 to 20 daily — that Commerce plans to operate on a first-come, first-served basis, Phillips said.

"With these, we didn't even dare starting a list," she said. Then there's the question of where the coins will work. Jake Wassenberg, Pepsi representative for Five Star vending, said his company was discussing options Monday and found they might not have to do anything.

Five Star, a subsidiary of Pepsi Co., handles all food and soda vending machines on campus and a portion of the ones in Manhattan.

Wassenberg said a few golden dollars already have shown up in machines in the Industrial Park area of Manhattan, and he is optimistic.

Information from the Mint indicates the golden dollar will leave the same electromagnetic footprint in machines as the Susan B. Anthony dollar does. Wassenberg said machines made after 1981 should be compatible.

"If it's not ready for it, it'll probably spit it back out, so there's no risk of losing your money," he said.

Tuition reimbursement changes made

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Starting next semester, students might have an extra week to drop classes and receive a full refund.

The resolution, adopted in last week's Student Senate meeting, fulfills one of the campaign promises made by Student Body President Jason Heinrich and Student Body Vice President Gabe Eckert.

"We met with the administration at the beginning of last summer with the proposal," Eckert said. "We've finally brought closure to the issue and reached an agreement."

Students will receive a 90-percent refund in the third week of class, and a 50-percent refund by the fourth week.

Adding the extra week was a grassroots, pro-student issue, Eckert said.

"Freshmen and transfer students will be able to match their learning style," Eckert said. "However, all students will definitely see the benefits."

The new tuition reimbursement schedule is one that Greg Noland, senior in secondary education, said he would have benefited from tuition reimbursement proposal

If the Kansas Board of Regents accepts Student Senate's proposal for a new tuition reimbursement schedule, students will have an extra week each semester to get a full refund for dropped classes.

Classes	Current refund schedule	Proposed schedule
First week	100-percent refund	100-percent refund
Second week	90-percent refund	100-percent refund
Third week	50-percent refund	90-percent refund
Fourth week	50-percent refund	50-percent refund
Fifth week	No refund	No refund

this semester.

Noland missed the first two weeks of classes due to a broken arm that required surgery. Noland had to choose between quitting his job or dropping two of his classes and becoming a part-time student. Leaving his job meant not being able to pay for school, so he dropped classes.

"One week just wasn't enough," Noland said. "A lot of students have part-time jobs. They don't have time to figure out if they can handle the load."

Noland, who changes at least one class every semester, said the extension is a good idea. Most labs don't even meet during the first week, he said.

The extra week gives students a little more time to figure out their classes.

University Registrar Don Foster said before the change officially happens, it must be approved by the university fee schedule and the Kansas Board of Regents.

K-State is still studying the economic effects if the proposal is accepted.

The study and resolution will reach the regents in late April.

"There are positive feelings about the proposal," Foster said. "If the fiscal impact is very large, then we'll take another look. Right now, there's a good chance of it being implemented."

KEY teaches leadership skills

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Its purpose is to develop a well-rounded individual through personal growth and brotherhood.

The Keep Educating Yourself program is a new educational initiative created by the national chapter of the Delta Chi fraternity in the past couple of years.

Tony McClain, KEY coordinator for K-State's Delta Chi chapter, said the program includes the total membership and begins in conjunction with the pledge or associate member program.

He said the purpose is not only to teach members about the greek system, the fraternity's history and the university, but also to help build tangible skills such as leadership and personal management capability. The program also includes help in career-building and job-searching.

"This education will stay with members through graduation," McClain said. "It will help develop tangible skills from leadership to finance that will help in every aspect of a member's life."

McClain said the program was developed a couple of years ago by alumni at the national level. He said they picked skills they felt were beneficial to members' learning and personal development.

The KEY program was still in its pilot stage with the first set of chapters that were picked to participate. McClain said K-State was one of those chosen for this round of implementations because it is one of the stronger chapters in the United States.

"Nationals picked those chapters who were stronger, so there would be a better chance at successfully implementing the program,"

McClain said. "The KEY program will get members more involved in themselves, their fraternity and the campus, while also experiencing personal growth."

Jon Smajda, vice president of Delta Chi, said the fraternity has not yet begun the KEY program. He said 10-15 members will be picked through an application process and will start the program in the next couple of weeks. The associate member class for the spring semester also will begin the program this year.

"A fraternity is more than just people who party and are social," Smajda said. "This program will be a vehicle to create more personal development in our members and to teach them things they will need to know later in life such as managing their time and financial skills."

Smajda said the number of those participating in the program will grow each semester until the entire membership of the house is in the program. He said the two- to four-year program will include activities ranging from community service to learning financial responsibility in the real world.

"This is a compliment to our chapter to be chosen as one of the pilot chapters of KEY," Smajda said. "This overall, all-encompassing program will help fraternity members to get more out of the fraternity and to learn more about themselves."

Because KEY is designed to be an educational experience lasting throughout a member's college career, McClain said those graduating prior to 2002 will not be eligible to participate in the program. Instead, he said they will help with the implementation and organization of the program in its pilot stage.

Delta Chi fraternity is one of the chapters nation-wide participating in an educational initiative called The KEY, for keep educating yourself. The KEY is a self-paced, individual development program. It is designed to provide members with a co-curricular experience throughout their undergraduate days and beyond, as well as to offer a well-rounded opportunity for personal growth through brotherhood.

WSU Student Senate calls for leader's ouster

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — Wichita State University's Student Senate is demanding the ouster of the student body president amid allegations he improperly used a food stamp card to buy food for a campus fund-raiser.

The student organization voted 20-1 Wednesday for the prompt and immediate resignation of J. Alberto Fregoso, WSU's Student Government Association president. Five student senators abstained.

He had not resigned as of Thursday.

The Senate could call for a recall vote that would entail circulating recall petitions or go through an impeachment process, said Lori Reesor, WSU's dean of students.

"From the university perspective, we are looking into the situation to see if there is any violation of the student code of conduct, and we make our own determination of his status as a student as a result of that," Reesor said Thursday.

Fregoso, a 29-year-old senior majoring in psychology and biological sciences, won't talk about ongoing investigations by the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, WSU's Division of Student Affairs and the student ombudsman.

In November, Fregoso bought food for an SGA banquet fund-raiser with a Vision Card, the state's food-stamp program, and was later reimbursed with organization funds, said Ryan Martin, the SGA treasurer who cut the $90.54 check.

SRS is investigating but won't comment on the case. "He's blamed it on a lapse of judgment on his part," Martin said. "When confronted about the situation, he's not denying that it happened ... The receipts are here to prove it."

bill banned smoking at the Capitol and at hospitals. He also put in legislation that originally called for states to sue the tobacco companies and dedicate settlement money to children's programs.

Another issue, Helgeson said, is the amount of money spent on smokers and their ailments. According to a report by the Tobacco Free Kansas Coalition, tobacco-caused health costs in Kansas are estimated at $630 million per year.

The smoking trend, however, has diminished, Helgeson said.

"There's still a lot of people that smoke, but there's a public awareness that says, 'It ain't cool anymore,'" he said. "It's amazing the change in the public attitude.

Nobody would have predicted this kind of turnaround 18 years ago. But it proves that if you have facts on your side, you have a group of people that work together and you have the funding and the resources to do that, you will eventually win."

This increase in public anti-tobacco groups has a big effect on tobacco companies, a lobbyist for a tobacco company said. Stock prices have gone down and some companies have or will diversify into other areas for profit, he said.

"The biggest challenge is that legislation isn't written with the herd mentality or without all the facts," he said. "Our challenge is having a forum to present the different views on the issue and get a fair hearing."

But the tobacco companies have been listening to the public, he said.

"My company over the years has changed its attitude about these types of activities. We're supportive of age restriction, school restriction, those kind of activities," he said.

Although the lobbyist said he doesn't agree with government mandates or legislations, he said he supports individual owners and businesses who decide whether or not their place will be smoke-free. In addition, he said the company encourages education for the youth and that a large part of master settlement agreement fees should be used for that end.

"It's tough for kids," he said. "It's part of growing up in a home where parents care about their kids and see that they have the facts and can encourage them to show restraint on all sorts of issues, not just tobacco, but drugs, alcohol, things in everyday life. That's where it really starts."

This might be a challenge for the parents, but youth have their own to deal with, Feeney said.

"Probably the biggest challenge is letting the youth voice be heard and trying to get the youth's opinion through, as opposed to adults making our own choices," she said.

TASK will continue to voice kids' opinions as they prepare for the rally next year. Meanwhile, people need to still listen, said Jarrod Worthington, senior at Louisburg High School.

"I'd say at school, people laugh at us because they really don't know what we're about," he said. "I mean, really, we're not quite a majority, and it's kind of tough to get people to realize that we're in this because we think it's right and not for anything else."

"We need to take it back to our communities. That's where it really starts," he said.

If Manhattan decides to pass a city-wide ordinance to eliminate smoking from public places, President Jon Wefald would have the option of eliminating smoking on campus.

The idea appears to be gaining in support from Manhattan and K-State.

On Wednesday, residence halls passed a resolution to get rid of smoking rooms in the residence halls slowly. In the fall 2000, the number of smoking rooms will go from 65 percent to 30 percent of residence halls, making them 70-percent smoke-free.

In 2001, residence halls will eliminate smoking rooms completely. The residence halls will have the option of creating a special room designated for smoking.

The Senate resolution was held for referral and will be debated next week.

In other Senate business, senators unanimously adopted a resolution in support of eliminating examinations during the university Career Fair.

"It will be a positive change for students," Student Body Vice President Gabe Eckert said.

to win the Big 8 Championship.

Winter later would go on to coach at the University of Washington in 1968, and then the NBA's San Diego Rockets in 1971.

The Rockets moved to Houston the next season. Midway through his second season in Houston, Winter left the NBA and returned to the college ranks as the head coach of Northwestern University.

He also coached California State University-Long Beach for five seasons before retiring from coaching in 1983.

Shortly after his first retirement, Winter was hired as an assistant coach and consultant for Louisiana State University. He worked at LSU for two years before retiring again. Winter's second retirement was as short as his first.

Bulls vice president of basketball operations Jerry Krause persuaded him to join the Bulls as an assistant coach and consultant in 1985.

Winter was inducted into the K-State Sports Hall of Fame on Sept. 20, 1991, and into the Kansas Hall of Fame on July 19, 1997.

"Determining which wings to designate as smoking wings must take a lot of specialty floors into consideration," she said. "We have to make sure they have options."

Specialty floors, such as those reserved for intensive study, must have both smoking and non-smoking options for male and female residents, Decke said.

Residence halls also have the option to become smoke-free starting immediately, Tammy Osborne, president of Ford Hall, said. Osborne said members of the Ford Governing Board will vote Sunday on whether to become smoke-free next semester.

"If it's not a majority vote, we're thinking of having surveys for the residents," she said.

One section of the no-smoking policy calls for each residence hall to vote on the idea of a smoking lounge once they have become smoke-free, Decke said.

Decke also said that if the governing bodies of each residence hall decided to implement smoking lounges, Housing and Dining Services would look into placing special filters in the lounges to aid ventilation.

The issue of smoking received additional scrutiny this semester when the burning of candles and incense became prohibited, Decke said.

"We have a policy against candles and incense that went into effect this summer, but it was a state decision," Decke said. "There have been so many incidents with rooms set on fire and things being burned, and a lot of the other schools in the area have passed that same rule."

This decision has raised concerns for residents that use candles for religious purposes, such as during Hanukkah.

"We don't make special allowances," Decke said. "The way the policy is set up, decorative candles are allowed as long as you don't burn them."

*Seriously.

I know that usually when you see an asterisk (like this * one) after the word free, it's not. But this is. We want to give you a free Macintosh iMac computer. All you have to do is come into our new branch to register for it.

Sure, we don't really want to just give it to you. When you come to register, we'll probably start with some small talk and then tell you about our Visa Check Card, or Internet Banking. And if we find out you're graduating in May, we'll tell you about a good way to get a new car to compliment that new job of yours.

So come register for this free Macintosh iMac computer at the new Commerce Bank branch on the south side of the Student Union's first floor. Besides a free Macintosh iMac computer, we'll have free refreshments and, as always, free checking.

Group plans peaceful protest in anticipation of Phelps' demonstration

By AMY CUNNINGHAM
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Matthew Hoppock, freshman in secondary education, said he was inspired to act against hate.

He is organizing a counter-protest to voice disagreement with Fred Phelps' anti-homosexual protest planned for the Barney Frank lecture today.

Rep. Barney Frank, is homosexual. He will be speaking about the World Trade Organization and trickle-down economics at 7:30 p.m. in Forum Hall.

The anti-Phelps protesters will meet at 6 tonight Lot D-1 on Denison Avenue. From there, the group will walk to the K-State Student Union where members will take their places in the free speech zone.

Protesters will not be affiliated with any one group.

"I don't think that it should be a group with a name, a leader or a creed," he said. "I think that it should be autonomous individuals who decided to stand against Fred Phelps. I think that is a lot more powerful."

Hoppock's first experience with Phelps came in his hometown of Salina, Kan.

"He was protesting at the church next to mine in Salina, Kan. Somehow he couldn't get the permits, so he stood on the lawn of our church," Hoppock said. "The only other time I've seen him was at the Noam Chomsky lecture this year. A friend of mine threw coffee on him and got arrested or had some type of police action taken."

These experiences led Hoppock to take action.

After discussing what he had seen with a friend and with members of his women's studies class at K-State, Hoppock said he knew something had to be done to make a statement to the Phelps group.

"What do you do to respond to hatred? How do you respond without feeding his fire?" Hoppock said. "We decided that we'll stand with our backs turned to him and publicly ignore him."

Hoppock then wrote an e-mail that he sent out among friends.

"I sent out the initial e-mail to about 30 or 40 people I knew would be interested," Hoppock said. "Now it's gotten all the way to Nebraska. I even received a letter from Massachusetts yesterday. It's everywhere."

He then created a listserv. Members were encouraged to share their ideas and suggestions about the protest.

Hoppock said he is expecting people from around the state. Groups from Lawrence, Topeka and Emporia, Kan., will be in attendance.

Hoppock said protesters will display peaceful behavior toward Phelps and his contingent.

Protesters will stand with their backs towards Phelps, whose group also will be the free speech zone.

Hoppock said that although he disagrees with Phelps' message, he is happy that Phelps has the right to be at the lecture.

"Some people think that we are coming to censor Phelps and that we don't want him to be there. If his rights were taken away, I would be the first person to stand up for him," Hoppock said.

He said his group's message is not one of censorship.

"Respecting free speech is good. We're saying, 'we're peaceful and we're quiet, but we want you to stop violently displaying hate on our campus.' I don't think that we'll change Fred Phelps' mind," he said. "But I want people to know that Kansas isn't full of hatemongers."

Web page copyright under contention

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A former employee of the city might be taking legal action against Manhattan.

Jerry Bacon claims the city violated his copyright on a Web page he built in 1997 and said he is considering taking legal action against the city.

"They are in ethical, moral and legal trouble," he said.

The city says Bacon, a former city employee, created a Web page for the city's community assistance technology center on city time.

The center assists disabled individuals using computers. Bacon worked about 10 hours a week as an instructor.

Hourly employees cannot claim copyright for materials they produce at work, Larry Hackney, city human resources specialist, said.

"There is no question. He does not have ownership of copyright," he said.

Bacon said the Web site was not part of his job description. He said the page was contract work, although he never got paid, and he did work on the Web page on his own time at home.

Hackney said Bacon was mistaken.

"No one ever instructed him to work on his own," Hackney said.

Copyrights do not have to be registered to be valid. The persons or group's name, the year of copyright and the copyright symbol is all that is needed, according to the Library of Congress Web site. A work prepared by an employee within the scope of

State representatives push education plan

By JOSS BRIGGS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas House Majority Leader Kent Glasscock of Manhattan and House Education Chairman Ralph Tanner are pushing an 11-bill program to legislators in an ongoing effort to strengthen the state's education system.

The Years of Promise plan is an effort to reform public education, Glasscock said. It focuses on early childhood education as well as strengthening efforts to prepare teachers at the university level.

"For so long we have been too focused on such issues as funding, the funding formula, classroom size and a whole host of other issues that surround public education," Glasscock said. "The one thing that we have forgotten is what every parent in America intrinsically knows and that is that a great teacher will help your child learn."

Concern over teacher preparation arose when Tanner recently uncovered an Education Weekly report that gave Kansas a "D" in efforts to improve teacher quality.

Glasscock said that report is disturbing. The Glasscock-Tanner plan calls for teachers' being trained on classroom technology, paid mentors for first-time teachers and required exams on subject matter to attain a teaching certificate.

"Right now it is possible for teachers to teach American history without taking a single subject in the class," Glasscock said.

Ogden Elementary School exhibit teaches children about nature

Four-year-old Janessa Saulsberry was struggling.

She was reeling in a 10-pound lake trout, but the fish kept eluding her. After three minutes, however, she accomplished her goal. And so did Ogden Elementary School.

"We wanted them to come in and feel like scientists," said Cindy Pitts, coordinator for the exhibit.

The school welcomed a crowd Saturday morning to the River Romp Exhibit, created by the school to teach children about nature and how humans study it.

One child tried on chest waders, another slipped on rubber gloves to catch plastic fish and a third stuck his hand in an aquarium, disappointed that he was not allowed to touch the turtle. Others, like Saulsberry, tried a simulated fishing program.

"When they first get the fish, they make big faces. They get quite excited," said Chris Otto, a naturalist at Milford's Nature Center.

This process, however, was interrupted when they announced it was story-telling time. A stampede of children ran around the corner and into the library, where soon the room filled up with hoots and giggles.

"It's a lot easier if I can get the audience to laugh," said John Stark, a storyteller, musician and naturalist from Texas. "It was a lot of fun because it was really intergenerational. That's when it's best."

Stark engaged the children with guitar and harmonica songs, in addition to a story that incorporated sounds and movements from the audience. While Stark put away his props, his sister led the children to the cafeteria, where there was free lunch for everyone. Crumbs were left scattered as children eagerly resumed their day.

"We wanted something the Ogden community could relate to," Susan Denson-Guy, exhibit designer said. "Since it's close to the river, we wanted to focus on wildlife."

Denson-Guy said it was fun to see children's responses to the new room where the exhibit was housed.

"They're amazed that something like this is in their school," she said. "Parents feel a sense of pride, too."

The school also received help from K-State students who were members of the K-State sub-unit of the American Fisher Society.

Co-president Travis Horton, graduate student in biology, said its main purpose was to engage children in an aquatic education about frogs, turtles and fish diversity.

"Children are always interested in fish. It's Community, commission celebrate new site of monolith

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City commissioners and community members gathered in the wind and cold Friday morning for the ground breaking of Heritage Court, the new home for the Ten Commandments monolith.

Ed Klimek, city commissioner, said Friday was a significant day for the city of Manhattan.

"It really is a great day, and a cold day," he said.

Klimek said he believed the 10 Commandments issue turned out to be a positive one.

"It brought some unity to a city that was seeking unity," he said.

Leonard Delgado, president-elect for the Fraternal Order of Eagles for Kansas, said the Eagles donated monoliths to communities across the country for the benefit of the youth of America.

In 1958, the Eagles donated a monolith to Manhattan Parks and Recreation, but because of vandalism, the monolith was relocated to the front of City Hall, where it stayed for 42 years.

In 1998, city commissioners voted to remove the monolith after several community members and organizations said they wanted it removed because of the establishment clause of the First Amendment separating church and state.

Now, its new home will be on the property of Manhattan Christian College.

"The Christian college would be the best place to place the stone, because everyone can view it," Delgado said.

Kenneth Cable, president of MCC, said the college was trying to accomplish two things by being the new home of the monolith.

He said it wanted to do something in which the whole community could be a participant in and the college wanted to perpetuate what the United States was founded on.

Construction of Heritage Court is planned to begin in about 25 days.

Klimek said he looks forward to the day when people can go to Heritage Court and spend time there to meditate and pray in front of the Ten Commandments.

Don Rose, a member of the group that recalled City Commissioner Karen McCulloh for voting to remove the monolith from City Hall, was present for the ground breaking of the monolith's new home.

"I think it's wonderful. I'm very appreciative of the Christian college here," he said. "The only thing that hurts is that it's private ground instead of public ground."

Football player arrested for DUI, released on bond

By SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State football player Dymond Carter was arrested over the weekend for driving under the influence of alcohol.

Carter, junior first-string cornerback, was arrested at 1:25 a.m. Saturday at 1300 Anderson Ave., said Sgt. Tim Hegarty of the Riley County Police Department.

The arresting officer, Matthew Coffey, could not be reached for comment.

Carter was later released on a $500 bond.

Sports information director Kent Brown said the matter will be dealt with internally. It is unknown at this time if Carter will face suspension.

"It's done like it always is," he said. "It's handled internally between the coach and the athlete."

Carter should appear before the city court within 10 working days, Hegarty said.

The cause of the crash is under investigation.

Transformer blast sparks fire near KU's Strong Hall

LAWRENCE — An electrical transformer exploded and caught fire behind the Strong Hall administration building at the University of Kansas on Saturday night.

No injuries or damage to the interior of the building were reported.

The transformer, located just a few feet behind the building, blew at 8:15 p.m., and the fire was under control before 10 p.m., according to a university spokeswoman and students at the scene.

Smoke darkened the rear wall of Strong Hall.

One person had been working in a computer laboratory inside the building but was unhurt.

A shower of sparks burst into the sky after the initial explosion.

"It almost looked like a bunch of Roman candles going off," said student Josh Johnson, who watched from the parking lot of the Student Union about a quarter-mile from Strong Hall.

That was followed by what student Mike Johnson, who was inside the Student Union, called "the biggest cloud of smoke I've ever seen, covering half of campus."

The northern half of the campus then went dark as power was shut off to let firefighters approach the flaming transformer and apply foam.

Street lights and the normally illuminated Campanile bell tower, a campus landmark, went dark, but some lights remained on in Strong Hall and other buildings.

Sometime after the transformer went up in flames, fire alarms went off in the nearby Wescoe Hall classroom building and Watson Library.

The campus Public Safety office was busy with the fire and did not immediately release any information.

Strong Hall was placed on the National Register of Historic Places in 1998.

The Classical Revival structure was built in three phases from 1909 through 1923.

Engineer group raises funds by raffling deans' parking spaces for 2-week stint

By JOSS BRIGGS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tomek Rys, sophomore in mechanical engineering, won't have to park his Mustang five minutes away from class for several days this month.

Rys is one of three winners of the Society of Women Engineers raffle for deans' parking spaces.

"It will save me some distance to walk, since I usually park in the old stadium lot," Rys said.

Mark Clarke, junior in computer science, and Rita Shade, keyboard operator, also won the right to park in an engineering dean's space.

The K-State chapter of Society of Women Engineers sold raffle tickets for two weeks and drew the winners at noon Friday.

The society sold $100 in tickets during the promotion, Megan Robinson, chapter student president, said.

"It went OK," Robinson said. "I would have liked to have made a little bit more money, but I think students aren't that big on buying raffle tickets."

Robinson said the money will be used to send someone to the Society of Women Engineers' national conference in Washington, D.C., in June. She said it also will help fund social events and other organizational needs.

"We got the idea at nationals," Robinson said. "Some other school had done it, and we thought it sounded like a good idea."

The Society of Women Engineers is a group committed to recruiting and retaining women in the predominately male major of engineering, said Margaret Rys, faculty advisor for the group.

"At K-State, we try to attract freshmen and sophomore students to our organization and help them in the first two years to become effective students," Rys said. "For the first few years, students in engineering are taking classes outside of their major so they don't have too much interaction within their own department. So our society is a way to help them interact with their peers."

The society also helps send students to the national conference.

"The conference offers students the possibility of finding a job," Rys said. "Those girls that are very close to graduation and those looking for an internship might find a job or internship over there."

Students, community members celebrate Chinese New Year

By CLIF PALMBERG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nearly 500 people in Manhattan celebrated the beginning of the year of the dragon.

K-State students and faculty, along with Manhattan residents, filled the cafeteria and auditorium of Manhattan High School East Campus to celebrate the Chinese New Year. The new year is based on the cycles of the moon and can fall anytime between late January and the middle of February.

The event, which was sponsored by the Chinese Students and Scholars Association at K-State, celebrated what is considered to be the most important festival in China.

"Chinese people really enjoy the program, and we have all kinds of guests," said Jianming Yu, president of the Chinese Students and Scholars Association and graduate student in agronomy.

The celebration began at 6 p.m. with a reception. The large selection of snacks, which included spring rolls, egg rolls, fried apples and fried dumplings, was catered chiefly by Hunan Chinese Restaurant.

After the reception there was a show that included 19 different acts. Singing, a poetry reading, a children's fashion show, music and children's dances comprised the event. Each performance was introduced in Chinese and English, then sung or spoken in Chinese.

Zhaohui Su, graduate student in chemical engineering, was one of the performers. Su performed in a waltz called "The Wave of the Danube."

"This is my first time to be a performer," Su said. "I'm very excited — we have rehearsed for three weeks."

The celebration here was different than China's.

"In China, each individual family comes together to the mother's and father's house to watch a special on television," Su said. "Here, we try to gather everybody together to celebrate in a big party."

Besides people from China attending the festival, students were encouraged to invite others.

"By inviting our professors, house families, friends, university offices and campus organizations, we not only want to let them share our happiness and culture, but also want to take this opportunity to show our thanks to them for the help and support that they have been giving to us," said Hong Wang, graduate student in educational computing.

A number of K-State students who attended represented many cultures. Summer Brown, senior in elementary education, attended the event.

"I came with an international friend I met through the Helping International Students program," Brown said.

Alice Zhao, 9, performs a Chinese skit, "The Herdboy," Saturday at the Manhattan High School East Campus. The show was celebrating the Chinese New Year. Zhao is the daughter of Lian Fu Zhao, graduate student in grain science and industry.

Egg roll eating contest among New Year festivities

By GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One barf bucket and six egg rolls later, Dexter Curry, freshman in open-option, was awarded the $25 K-State Union gift certificate for being the egg roll eating champion of the Union Food Court.

"I felt great," Curry said. "I am going to Disneyland. The competition was steep."

Vaughn Deguzman, senior in life science, went face-to-face against Curry in a tie-breaker after the first round, in which he ate three egg rolls in 30 seconds. After another thirty-second round, Curry won by eating three egg rolls to Deguzman's two.

"Everyone was good competition. I think there was a game plan involved, though," Deguzman said. "I tried to sabotage his operation, but it didn't help much."

The competition began at about 11:15 a.m. Friday inside the food court. "We have a corporation handbook that we go by for different monthly events and this month was the celebration of the Chinese New Year," said Murry Thompson, director of Food Court.

Originally, the first 10 students seated at the table by 11 a.m. were eligible, but it was narrowed down to eight due to the demand for more elbow room from the already seated participants.

"There were only eight out of 10 contestants, and they needed their room, so we didn't recruit anymore," Tiffany Morris, food court supervisor, said. "I think it brought people in to watch though, so I am happy for that."

Morris said the festivities were due to food service's desire to help students become interested in other cultures' celebrations.

"It is to celebrate the Chinese New Year," Morris said. "We wanted to make students more aware of other cultures, especially since we celebrate American traditions all the time."

Thompson said they hope to continue the event but are subject to a company handbook for activities.

"We will try to keep doing the competition, but like any big corporation, we are subject to change," Thompson said. "It should continue to be an annual event, though."

Other events are being planned for the food court in the future, Morris said. They are hoping to sponsor a jalapeño-eating contest around the time of Cinco de Mayo.

Thompson said she is enthusiastic for the development of more activities. He said he sees the activities as bringing students together for one vital purpose — food.

"I think it is good for the students. It gives them entertainment and an opportunity to rally for their friends," Thompson said. "It boosts morale for everybody."

Men's basketball needs students' support

The K-State men's basketball team needs your help.

No, they do not need you to step onto the court and start dishing out passes, hammering down dunks or applying defensive pressure.

Rather, the team needs your moral support for the remainder of its season. The team's record this season has been a disappointing 8-12 overall, but an even more dismal 1-8 in conference play.

While fan support probably would not have been enough to put them in national championship contention, it might have been enough to keep the Cats out of the Big 12 cellar — where they currently dwell in 11th place.

An NCAA tournament berth certainly appears to be a long shot now, at best, but the team still has a lot to play for. A few more wins in conference play would certainly make the Cats' record look more impressive.

Not only could the team pick up a few wins; it has a chance to accomplish what all K-State teams dream of doing — defeating the rival Kansas Jayhawks.

The KU game is Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum. K-State will battle Oklahoma on the road Tuesday before returning home for the game of the season. This provides time for students to get ready for the game — pick up those season tickets that came with the football combination or buy some of the tickets that still remain for the game.

The team is a group of students working their tails off in an attempt to better themselves for top-notch competition. Get behind them so they can finish their season without vulturous fans

breathing down their necks — and the neck of their coach. If the season ends as a disappointment, there will be plenty of time to place the blame.

For now, go out and show your support. They need to know the campus is behind them.

► OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

I'd like to see how well the people who criticize the basketball team play.

K-Rock made a nice start by getting rid of those deejays. If the rest of the DJs in this town would quit, maybe we'd have some radio in this town.

I think that instead of worrying about smoke taking up the campus and public air in Manhattan, we need to worry about Heinrich's huge head and expanding ego from trying to puff up his resume as much as he can by trying to be the political leader.

This is for the bike cop. I just want to let him know I'm getting in shape, and I'm going to blow through one of those dismount zones, and he ain't gonna be able to catch me.

I haven't heard much from Brandi Hertig this semester. Let's keep it that way.

You want me to stay off your sidewalk? Stay off my freaking bike path, jerk.

I like this no-smoking resolution. I did some math, and I can save 30 bucks a year on the Febreze I won't have to buy.

I want to blow a big puff of smoke in Jason Heinrich's face.

If you ban smoking in bars, you're putting that girl who sells cigarettes and cigars out of work. Now, is that right?

Jason Heinrich: Manhattan is not your communist empire.

To all those people who keep on backing the basketball team, saying that "they're not that bad," well, guess what. Seven losses in a row, by mostly double-digit points — that's bad.

To those of you from Salina who have been paying $6.50 for movies for three years, I just wanted to let you know that you've been getting screwed for three years.

I think the university should cut costs by serving squirrel in the cafeteria.

I think the column by David Levin, about parking, is the best article I've ever read in the Collegian.

Instead of harassing smokers, we should be working on getting Conan O'Brien as a Landon Lecturer.

Hey, Max: I'd like to sign up to be on the search committee to find Tom Asbury's replacement.

I'd just like to say that Sister Souljah is one of the most engaging speakers I've ever heard speak in my entire life. It was an incredible event.

Quote — a smoker's desire to smoke is infringing on another person's right to breathe clean air — unquote. Jason Heinrich knows what's going on.

I'd like to apologize for that last comment. My roommate was a little drunk on that one.

I'd just like to point out to Travis Weigel that the Pledge of Allegiance didn't contain the words "under God" until McCarthyism added it in the 1950s.

I would like to say that Travis was right on with his article called "Identity crisis."

Those people who bash Snyder for his recruiting should go to another school, because Snyder is the best thing that ever happened to Kansas State University.

THE influential VOTE

Voting, learning about candidates' stances on issues represent Americans' only opportunity to affect membership of nation's highest court

In the spring of 1963, locked in solitary confinement in a Birmingham, Ala., jail,

Martin Luther King Jr. wrote a letter perhaps even more important than his famous "I Have a Dream" speech.

He just had been arrested for defying a court order not to lead a civil-rights march. When several white clergymen in Birmingham publicly condemned his strategy of civil disobedience, King was inspired to write his "Letter from Birmingham Jail," explaining why it sometimes was just to break the law.

In his letter, reprinted in his book "Why We Can't Wait," King wrote, "there are two types of laws: just and unjust. One has not only a legal but a moral responsibility to obey just laws. Conversely, one has a moral responsibility to disobey unjust laws. I would agree with St. Augustine that 'an unjust law is no law at all.' ... A just law is a man-made code that squares with the moral law or the law of God. An unjust law is out of harmony with the moral law."

With these words, King explained the real basis for the civil-rights movement — a higher law, above government and the courts, coming directly from God. In the same way, the Founding Fathers wrote in the Declaration of Independence that "all men ... are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights." In 1863, Abraham Lincoln, in his "Proclamation for Appointing a National Fast Day," wrote of "the duty of nations as well as of men to own their dependence upon the overruling power of God." And the words of Thomas Jefferson now are engraved on the Jefferson Memorial: "God who gave us life gave us liberty. Can the liberties of a nation be thought secure when we have removed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people that these liberties are of the gift of God?"

This fundamental ethic, that all authority is ultimately subject to a higher moral law, is now under full assault by a group of unelected and generally unaccountable men and women — the judicial branch. Time and again in recent decades, Supreme Court decisions directly have attacked both the existence of a higher law and the right to self-government.

It began in 1973 with Roe v. Wade. As Charles Colson notes, "In one swoop, the Court sought to extinguish a political debate then being carried out in 50 state legislatures regarding a sensitive moral question — the legal status of early human life." Apparently, the Court saw all this democracy going on and just had to put a stop to it.

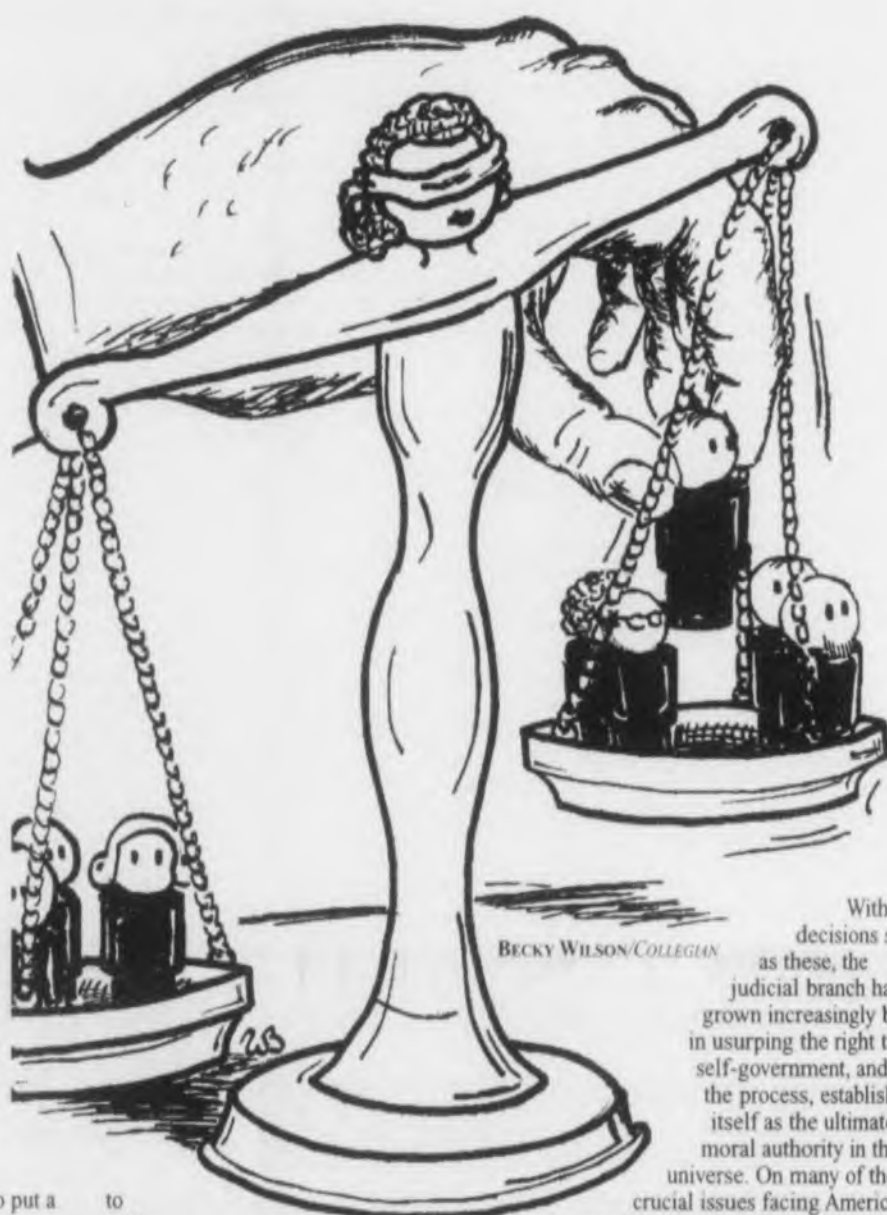

In 1992, in Lee v. Weisman, the Court disallowed publicly sponsored expression of any "shared conviction that there is an ethic and a morality which transcend human invention." In this ruling, the Court in essence declared that the very principles upon which our freedom is based are unconstitutional.

In the same year, the justices handed down their decision in Planned Parenthood v. Casey. The text of the decision, written by Anthony Kennedy, contains the following drivel: "At the heart of liberty is the right to define one's own concept of existence, of meaning, of the universe and of the mystery of human life." This sounds, on the surface, like a grand defense of freedom. But take it to its logical conclusion, and it quickly is apparent that by this standard, virtually no democratically enacted law could stand. Any law is bound to interfere with someone's "concept of existence."

In the 1995 case Romer v. Evans, the Court struck an even more powerful blow to self-government. The people of Colorado had passed a referendum barring the granting of special privileges on the basis of sexual orientation. The Court struck down this democratically enacted law, claiming to know the real motivation of the citizens of Colorado was not to prevent reverse discrimination but to perpetuate bigotry.

In 1997, though, the Court went even further in its City of Boerne v. Flores decision, the first challenge to the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993. RFRA was passed unanimously in the House of Representatives. Only three senators voted against it. It was enthusiastically signed by President Clinton. On an issue as controversial as religious freedom, this unanimity was astonishing. As Colson notes, "If ever a piece of legislation reflected the will of the people, it was RFRA." Yet the Court struck down this law. Apparently, that much self-government was just too much of a threat to the Court's power.

BECKY WILSON/COLLEGIAN

With decisions such as these, the judicial branch has grown increasingly bold in usurping the right to self-government, and, in the process, establishing itself as the ultimate moral authority in the universe. On many of the crucial issues facing America today, we are coming to be ruled by nine unelected individuals.

What, then, can be done about this?

Vote.

Professor Richard Garnett of Notre Dame University Law School writes, "Not only will the next president appoint hundreds of federal trial and appellate judges, he or she will likely appoint the successors to Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, and Justice John Paul Stevens." Find out if candidates will appoint activist judges who will overrule democracy and impose their "concept of existence" on the people, or judges who will uphold self-government and recognize the historical basis of our freedom.

One way or the other, for good or evil, the next president will influence America for decades to come.

Abortion issues neither wrong, right; people deserve respect for decisions

One of the biggest debates facing us as a society is the abortion debate. There almost has been an all-out war between the opposing sides.

There have been shootings and persecution because of it, and it is one of the most serious issues we have faced in the past decade. It probably will continue to be a very serious debate in the upcoming election and in the general future.

For the past couple of weeks, you — as a reader — have been bombarded with views on the issue of abortion. All of these views have come from the pro-life stance.

Although I know you probably are tired of hearing about it, I feel it is only fair that the other side be represented as well.

I believe that every woman — and man, if applicable — should have a choice. I'm not saying, however, that abortion is right or wrong. What I'm saying is that everyone is given free will and therefore should be given the right to choose for themselves.

The consequences — or non-consequences — are that people's to deal with, so shouldn't they be able to choose what is right for them?

Furthermore, men are given a simple and — to some — acceptable choice. If a young man and woman get pregnant, and the young man decides to shirk his responsibilities (not that all do), all he needs to do is leave without another thought. This irresponsible response leaves the woman with a terrible burden.

Although most people will admit a father abandoning his child is a sad, unfortunate and irresponsible thing to do, the same people attest that a mother doing the same is a terrible thing equated with either cold-heartedness, in cases of abandonment and in some cases of adoption, or murder, in cases of abortion.

That argument is one to which I do not have a set answer. However, there are people who do have answers for that argument or any argument. Some say it isn't murder, and some say it is. That is their choice and their belief. And everyone has a right to their beliefs.

As with most choices, though, there is a window of time through which to act. If that window shuts, time is up. There comes a point where a person can just wait too long. If time runs out, then one should deal with the results of one's procrastination.

But, as with everything, there is an exception. A woman taking fertility drugs conceived seven fetuses. The doctor advised aborting four or five of the fetuses to help carry the remaining to full term. Based on religious beliefs, the couple refused — as a personal choice. However, an infection was found in the mother and in the fetuses. When they did not respond to antibiotics, the family was faced with another choice. Either abort the 5-month-old fetuses or the mother will die along with the septuplets. To me, there is little choice in a situation like that.

There are those who say abortion should be illegal or even that there should be a Constitutional amendment banning it. If this happens, what do we do in situations like the one I just mentioned?

Above all, the issue comes down to personal rights. Pro-lifers are entitled to their beliefs, often through religious reasons. For a lot of people, religion makes their choice the only acceptable one. But there are people who don't have those same beliefs, religious or otherwise, and they equally are entitled to their ideas.

It is up to each individual to decide what is right and what is wrong. That decision and acceptance of repercussions, if any, is that person's to deal with, and either decision should be respected.

Abortion isn't right for everyone. Neither is early or unhealthy motherhood. There are many issues I didn't touch on, but the bottom line is, no one thinks alike.

We can't push beliefs on people who don't agree.

People live their own lives, and how they choose to live it is up to them.

DANCEarmageddon

Students celebrate in atmosphere of heaven, hell at KSUARH's 'Winter Blast'

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Residence hall students walked into post-apocalyptic hell of fire and chaos on Friday night.

"It really looked like armageddon, like a bomb had exploded," Sally Ridder, freshman in modern languages, said.

The Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls' annual winter ball was Friday from 8 p.m. to midnight at the Wareham Opera House. The winter dance is the second of two dances KSUARH puts on for residence hall students. The theme for the evening was "Post-Armageddon Winter Blast." Students walked in and were greeted with paper flames and scattered newspapers.

"Decorations at the Wareham upon entering simulated hell with garbage and flames," Michelle Stribling, KSUARH adviser, said. "Inside the dance, the seating area looked like heaven, with soft lighting."

Steven Freund, KSUARH national communications coordinator and sophomore in psychology, came up with the theme of the dance.

"With Y2K everyone thought things would slow down," Freund said. "But everything was OK, so let's party."

The annual winter dance was free for all residence hall students and their friends.

"It is a tradition," said Dave Woodruff, KSUARH president and senior in elementary education.

The dance is a strong tradition for KSUARH, and residents look forward to the event every year.

Stribling said. The dance gives students something different to do on the weekends, Woodruff said.

"I'm excited students came and had a good time," he said.

Eric Wittman, freshman in architectural engineering, said the night gave students a good chance to get out and about.

"It is different than Aggieville, different from the norm," Wittman said. "It is good, clean fun."

Ridder said the dance reminded her of high school.

"It makes you feel like a community," she said.

For some, the night was sophisticated and posed the opportunity to meet new people.

"I just came here to meet women and eat the food," Wittman said. "It's a formal atmosphere, a little like 'A Night at the Roxbury.'"

For others, the focus of the evening was just being in good company.

"It is great seeing all my best friends dressed up and having a blast," Jennie Idol, freshmen in open-option, said.

Woodruff said part of the importance of the dance is letting students know that KSUARH is not all politics.

"We like to have fun, too," Woodruff said.

1st lady launches campaign

By MARC HUMBERT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PURCHASE, N.Y. — With the president beside her and 2,000 supporters chanting her name, Hillary Rodham Clinton formally launched her campaign Sunday to be a U.S. senator from New York, a state she has lived in only a month.

The race for the seat being vacated by fellow Democrat Daniel Patrick Moynihan is likely to pit Clinton against New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani in what could be one of the most flamboyant political campaigns in memory.

No other first lady has ever run for public office.

"I am honored today to announce my candidacy for the U.S. Senate from New York," Clinton said as shouts of "Hillary! Hillary!" rang through a university gymnasium not far from her new home in the suburbs north of New York City.

"I may be new to the neighborhood, but I'm not new to your concerns," she said, while President Clinton, her mother, Dorothy, and daughter, Chelsea, sat beaming behind her.

The president is said to be one of his wife's top advisers as she resumes the career she put aside to help him capture the White House.

Recalling a speech she made at her college commencement at Wellesley in 1969, Clinton said: "I often return to one thing I said back then, that politics is the art of making possible what appears to be impossible. I still believe that today. We can do what seems impossible if we have the vision, the passion and the will to do it together."

Clinton described her commitment to better schools, better health care and gun control. But she also took pains to describe herself as a new Democrat.

"I don't believe that government is the source of all our problems or the solutions to them," she said.

Her remarks were preceded by tributes from Moynihan, Sen. Charles Schumer and Reps. Nita Lowey of Westchester and Charles Rangel of Harlem, who joined her on stage during her speech and stayed after to shake hands with supporters.

Recent polls have shown Giuliani with a slight lead over Clinton and running even with her among women voters. That's a far cry from a year ago, when sympathy was strong from the Monica Lewinsky scandal and polls showed her well ahead of the mayor.

On Sunday morning talk shows, Giuliani reminded viewers of Clinton's late arrival to New York politics.

Cats drop 8th consecutive loss to Colorado at Bramlage

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State lost its eighth consecutive game, a 67-63 defeat, Saturday to Colorado at Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State tied the score, 48-48, when senior guard Cortez Groves stripped the ball from the Buffs and led a fast break down the floor that was capped by junior forward Kelvin Howell's dunk.

The dunk closed out a 10-0 Cats' scoring run that erased a 12-point deficit.

However, the run wasn't enough as K-State (8-12 overall, 1-8 Big 12) then hit a three-minute dry spell and Colorado (12-9, 3-6) went on a 7-0 spurt of its own to reclaim a lead it never would surrender, 55-48.

Despite the Buffs' surge, junior point guard Galen Morrison continued to pull K-State within reach using his long-range shooting. On three separate occasions, the Cats crawled to within three points. Morrison sank three three-pointers in the final four minutes of the game and ended with a team-high 17 points.

Head coach Tom Asbury praised Colorado's run, one from which K-State could not rally.

"We came down and took some good shots, but too quick," he said. "Not bad shots, just not in the flow of the offense shots, with no opportunity to get on the offensive boards, which we'd been doing a pretty good job of. They were shots that were right there that didn't go in, that they got the board on and went on down and scored. That was the difference in the game."

Senior forward-guard Josh Reid, playing in just his second game since suffering a broken right foot seven weeks ago, said if K-State could have taken the lead, things might have played out differently.

"That's always a huge difference," Reid said. "That's a big psychological advantage once you get the lead. We just never could do that tonight."

"We battled back, but we just couldn't quite get over the hump."

Another difference in the game was the production by Colorado freshman forward Stephane Pelle, who entered the game averaging eight points and six rebounds. Against the Cats, Pelle was seven of nine from the field for 14 points, and he grabbed eight rebounds.

"He played very well," Asbury said of Pelle. "He's probably the difference in the game, if you look at the statistical category, because everybody else is around their average."

"But he gets 14 and eight on us, and therein lies the difference."

K-State appeared a little sluggish to open both halves. The Cats went scoreless for the first five minutes of the game, while the Buffs fired out of the gate with a 10-0 lead.

The second half was more of the same as Colorado went on an 8-0 run in 5 minutes.

"I think we really self-destructed in the first part of it, but in the second half I just think they made some nice plays," Asbury said. "They did some good things. I think they executed pretty well."

Staring at the large deficit early in the game, K-State rebounded with a 10-2 run from the 9:12 mark to the 4:20 mark to get within one, 20-19. A Quentin Buchanan three-pointer and two Joe Leonard dunks highlighted the Cats' charge.

After playing just six minutes Wednesday against Iowa State, Reid played 26 minutes against Colorado and had four points, four rebounds and two assists. The best part of Reid's line was no turnovers.

"I was a little off," Reid said. "I think the one thing I did well was keep the offense running a little bit more smoother. My jumper is not quite there yet."

Cats' enthusiasm, effort not enough to surpass Missouri on Saturday

It was a game full of drama and suspense.

The K-State's women's basketball team's 72-68 loss to Missouri on Saturday unfolded with enthusiasm and the hope of finally breaking a four-game losing streak, but the game ended in disappointment.

The loss extended the Cats' (9-13, 2-7) losing streak to five games, but this time was different. Whereas K-State had struggled primarily with its guard play and ending games strongly, the Cats did both well Saturday.

Down the stretch, the Cats got three treys from Kristin Rethman and Kim Woodlee, and a bucket from Angie Finkes in the last 1:36. The run rallied the Cats from a 10-point deficit and brought them to within two points of the Tigers (14-6, 4-5).

Morgen Finneran battles Colorado's Kerensa Barr for the ball in the first half of Saturday's game at Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats lost the game 72-68, extending their losing streak to four games.

Rethman missed a late three that could have tied the game up with 6.2 seconds left, but K-State forward Nicky Ramage said the loss was strong.

"You couldn't ask for anything else from them," Ramage said. "They did everything that you could possibly want out of a guard by shooting those threes and making them."

K-State's run to end the game also actually softened the disappointment of the loss, Patterson said.

"It hurts to lose," Patterson said. "But it would have hurt 10-fold if we hadn't finished in that manner and competed down to the very last possession."

Although the Cats' last surge ended in a losing effort, K-State started off strong in the first half before faltering, and the team entered halftime trailing 34-35.

The Cats started the game with five players contributing to an 11-2 run. Then, after Missouri had caught up and gained the lead, Olga Firsova began to take over.

In the first half alone, Firsova scored 11 points, grabbed four boards, blocked three shots and had an assist. "I just felt like I could take it to the basket," Firsova said.

In addition to Firsova's 18 points, the Cats also got strong play from their other post players.

For the game, Ramage scored 15 points, and with her 10th point, she broke the 1,000-point barrier. Finkes also scored 12 points.

A large part of the Cats' success Saturday was their ability to handle

K-State center Olga Firsova fights for the ball with Missouri forward Mariena Williams in Saturday's game.

Missouri's full-court press, a press that forced 30 K-State turnovers in the game in Columbia.

"When we played them at Columbia, they seemed a little bit more tentative," Missouri's Julie Helm said. "And I've got to hand it to them tonight. We threw on the press, they handled it at times. They really know our offenses and our defenses, and they really adjusted this game."

The Cats played well enough that, if not for a six-minute scoring drought to start the second half, the Cats would have been in good position to win the game.

"Tonight the lesson was you better

Ramage milestone

Saturday in the loss, forward Nicky Ramage became one of 15 players to score 1,000 points and grab 500 rebounds in her career. The achievement came with 9:24 remaining in the second half.

Strong Shooting

The Missouri Tigers shot 50 percent from the field, and center Angie Finkes said it makes it hard to win when a team has that good a shooting day against the Cats.

"I think they found a lot of open shots in our defense, and looking at this stat sheet they shot 50 percent from the game. That's obviously something that we see as a problem," Finkes said.

Streak continues

The Cats lost their fifth straight game of the season on Saturday, and Finkes said the team is looking to right the streak.

"I think we have felt that urgency since the season started. You know, you don't really understand what it feels like until you are a senior. You know, I never really understood what it was like to walk out on the floor and understand that this was the last time I was going to play Missouri again," Finkes said.

Next up

The Cats' next action will be at 7 p.m. Wednesday against Oklahoma State in Stillwater, Okla.

Athletes' actions off field tarnish world of sports

Don McLean once wrote in perhaps the greatest song ever written, "American Pie": "But February made me bitter, with every paper I delivered the sad news on the doorstep, I couldn't take one more step."

Honestly, today feel very similar. Every day I walk into the Collegian offices in Kedzie Hall, and I hear the latest squabble.

"Such and such is accused of this or that."

"Hey, Nick did you hear that this athlete got arrested?"

It all really sucks after a while. I am tired of looking at the headlines and seeing that Rae Carruth is wanted in connection for murder. Ray Lewis that is wanted in connection with the deaths of two people, hours after the greatest Super Bowl of all time.

Granted, the verdict is still out on these athletes but these things are happening all the time. There is the issue of Tamarick Vanover and Bam Morris and their alleged problems with illegal drugs. As a Chiefs fan, I am embarrassed. As a person, I am disappointed.

The problems and incidents raise questions: is there a ray of hope in all of this? Can we as a society ever get away from these off-the-field problems? Is there a way to cure the world of these problems? I honestly do not know.

Still, it is ironic that all of these incidents are occurring off the field in the NFL, when on the field the St. Louis Rams and the Tennessee Titans just played in the greatest Super Bowl ever.

It was beautiful to watch two teams battle it out on the gridiron. It was awesome to watch the greatest spectacle in all of sports come down to two players on the game's final play. It was the type of play we all dream of when playing the receiver game, or waiting to fall asleep with a football lodged inside our arms as children.

Mike Jones, a Rams linebacker, and Titans wide receiver Kevin Dyson were playing the biggest downs of their lives. Jones made the improbable tackle, and Dyson, who was dragged to the carpet, was held short of his Super Bowl dreams.

It was magical to watch two men battle it out and leave football fans wanting more.

However, the events in the week following left me wanting to forget about the NFL for a while. It made me want to forget about the league and all of the crap surrounding it.

You know, it doesn't seem fair. It doesn't seem fair that players who choose to make the wrong decisions can drag down the league, a league where a majority of the players live clean lives and work exceptionally hard through charitable organizations.

It doesn't seem fair that somewhere in Kansas City, there is a 10-year-old kid who wears a Vanover jersey and idolizes him. He wants to see Vanover juke, bob and save games with his speed. Hell, I want to see that. Granted the verdict is still out, but things need to change.

We need to restore some values to America, because all of these problems are simply a reflection of society. I don't really know if we can do anything about these off-the-field problems until every person chooses to take responsibility for their actions.

The good news is that these incidents do not include everyone. The bad news is that they are still happening. The bad news is that a few incidents ruin sports' purity. The good news is that we still have those brief glimpses like the Super Bowl, when sports are pure, when two players battle it out on the field with all of their hearts. The bad news is that these great athletes' performances are greatly overshadowed by what happens off the field.

The bad news is that every time one of these incidents occurs, a sport's purity dies just a little bit more, a 10-year-old's eyes are not quite as wide as a jersey loses a little bit of its shine.

The good news is the verdict is still out. Things can change.

'The Sims' brilliantly designed, utterly enjoyable game

By KEN WELLS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

I remember the thrill of being a part of designing a living, growing city for the first time when playing "SimCity," a positively ancient title from Will Wright and Maxis, Inc. After evolutions ("SimCity 2000," "SimCity 3000") and variations of the theme of varying quality ("SimEarth," "SimIsle," "SimAnt"), Wright finally has topped himself with "The Sims."

This latest title transcends the sheer playability of the "SimCity" series, creating one of the most addictive and intriguing computer games ever created. Whereas "SimCity" simulated unbridled urban sprawl, "The Sims" best can be described as a suburb simulator — but in the most complete sense. You control a specific household and its members one at a time as it struggles to thrive in a truly interactive community. Neighbors call and stop by, your digital protagonists will have to get jobs and hold them down, the house will become a mess. ... It's nothing more than daily mundane life, but recreated chillingly well.

For example, neighbors have different interests, different attitudes and different astrological signs, all of which affect their conversations. My first digital creation met the neighbors and promptly hit it off with the female half of the pair — well enough to earn an angry slap from her husband, which caused my spindly protagonist to whine and blubber like a baby. Passion, jealousy, even alternate lifestyles creep up if the chips fall just so.

In the likes of "SimCity," "The Sims" has the player try simulate a successful suburban family.

This game has particular resonance for the college student. Bills arrive and must be paid every three days. You can order pizza for $40, but the garbage doesn't just disappear; it has to be cleaned, and sometimes your character will inform you that he or she is just too depressed to do it.

Even bodily functions are rendered, though when your characters bathe, disrobe or use the toilet, their naughty bits are blurred just like the faces on "Cops." (And if you don't make it to the bathroom in time, yes, your character might have an accident.)

If God is in the details, this is the holiest computer game ever. It's an addictive delight to build your own house, customize it with your own carefully chosen furniture and belongings, and shape your individual occupants as best as you can. Maybe your character will be an outgoing professional sports star, or maybe a suave astronaut or maybe a rail-thin recluse. Maybe he'll never fall in love, or maybe she'll have someone propose to her. The possibilities are not endless, but certainly astonishing.

It's almost impossible to capture the essence of "The Sims" without drifting into narrative, so bear with me. One particular character, Mortimer, lives with his wife, Bella, and their school-age daughter Cassandra. Mortimer invited their neighbor Scott over for a bite, only to watch Scott and Bella flirt shamelessly until — boing — two huge heart icons popped up over their heads. Mortimer slapped Scott silly, the party broke up, and Bella turned in early.

While Mortimer prepared a bite to eat before his night shift, a grease fire consumed part of the kitchen, and even as the fireman foamed down the last of the blaze, the phone was ringing off the hook to tell Mortimer that his tardiness had just cost him his job. Cassandra watched the fire, bawling her eyes out, and skipped school the next day, sending her grades down.

This is just a hint of the interconnected systems under the surface of "The Sims." The dynamic nature of this simulated society makes it constantly compelling, always interesting. You'll feel a personal triumph when a character gets a promotion at work because you made him or her read a book, or when they splurge for the big-screen television. These characters act and feel alive in a way few, if any games, have been able to capture.

While the gameplay is engrossing, the other aspects of the game's design are all exemplary: the graphics are easily discernible (from the fish tank to the smoke detector, from the basketball goal to the coffee maker), the sound effects are alternately hilarious and evocative, the interface takes a few minutes to adjust to, then feels perfectly intuitive. If there is a criticism to be levied against "The Sims," it's that the game is too compelling; many people might find the simulated socialization an adequate substitute for the real thing.

"The Sims" appeals to people across virtually every strata: men and women, young and old will find something to enjoy. Addictive, attractive and intriguing, this is the most compelling computer game I've played in a long time, and certainly worth your attention.

Intelligent lyrics boost blend of rock, reggae

By JUSTIN HAYWORTH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Reggae soul and flavor aren't quite synonymous with Madison, Wis., but after listening to Natty Nation's latest album, "Earth Citizen," they might be soon.

The 12-track album delivers powerful, thought-provoking lyrics over the meshed sounds of rock and reggae.

"Earth Citizen" is the self-produced second album from the five-member band, which hails from Madison. Its reggae sound has an edge fueled by electric guitar riffs and anchored with a solid lyrical flow.

The album starts with the track "Coming Home," a peaceful call for worldwide unity and change for the betterment of the future. This track sets the tone for the whole album with deep, meaningful, and thought-provoking lyrics.

The album flows along through the next two tracks, "Brand New World" and "Save I," with much of the same sound and tone as the first song.

Natty Nation and Boom Shaka, two American reggae acts, will play 90-minute sets during a concert in celebration of Black History Month and Bob Marley's birthday, which was Sunday. The concert is scheduled for 7 p.m. Tuesday in the Main Ballroom of the K-State Student Union.

"Open the Door," the fourth track, is a song about love and fighting for those things you love and believe in, a timeless message of keeping the door open to your heart and soul so the positive things can flow in.

The next four songs, "Save the Children," "Heart Says," "Music," and "Stand in Love," follow much of the same caring soulful sound as "Open the Door," delivering messages of love and survival.

The ninth track, "Reggae All Through the Night," takes a step back from the messages of the earlier four songs to serve as an anthem for the music the band plays.

The 10th track, "Rainbow," is a deep, soul-searching track with a slow, mellow flow. It is followed by a remix of "Open the Door," and then capped off with the final track, "Fertile Lands."

The "Fertile Lands" track helps to sum up the album by bringing the listener back around to the messages of the first few songs and the need for change.

Overall, "Earth Citizen" is a soul-filled, full reggae experience that doesn't compromise the standards set by other great reggae stars of the past.

Lawrence's 'The Coast is Clear' provides listeners pure country throughout album's 10 tracks

By CHELSEA SCHMIDT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"The Coast is Clear" for country music's "Keeper of the Stars" artist to push his way up the charts once again.

Tracy Lawrence has done it again with his newest compact disc, "The Coast is Clear." Kicking off with an upbeat tune, while mixing in ballads among the 10 tracks, this CD has a strong potential for making it to the top. Although some songs are upbeat, all 10 tracks clearly are of the country genre.

Lawrence kicks off his CD with the song "Better Man, Better Off," which is typical of his style. This tune about the perils of breaking up with a girlfriend demonstrates Lawrence's ability to touch couples everywhere. This song, with other upbeat tempos on the CD, trigger an urge among listeners to get up and two-step or swing dance.

Paralleling his ability to make the listener want to dance, Lawrence produces beautiful ballads, allowing the group's musical talent to be revealed. The best of these ballads is "While You Sleep." The song opens with a beautiful piano solo by Tony Harrell and fiddle accompaniment by Rob Hajacos. With this display of musical talent, one almost hopes this will be an instrumental piece, but later discovers that Lawrence's vocals only make the tune stronger and more enjoyable.

Although there are two songs that could have been left off without any disappointment, eight out of the 10 tracks make this CD worth purchasing.

Lawrence wraps up his CD with "As Lonesome As I Get," another song with great fiddle solos and an interesting mandolin addition by Brent Rowan.

With his powerful love songs and upbeat dance tunes, Lawrence produces a CD unmatched by any of his previous releases. "The Coast is Clear" is a must-have for any true country music lover.

Soda tabs to benefit charity

■ Golden Key to support Ronald McDonald House.

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Saving pop tabs might help families in need.

Dacia Daniels, president of Golden Key and senior in accounting, said the pop-tab service project is a regional project conducted each year by the national honorary. She said students in past years have been generous in donating the tabs to benefit the Ronald McDonald House in Topeka, and she said she expects much of the same this year. "This is a great charity project because it helps in so many ways," Daniels said.

Jennifer Witt, national service chairwoman for Golden Key and junior in microbiology, said the service project was started late this year, but she said the group should get the same result. The service project lasts through the end of the year.

"This is an organization that helps families while they are away from home because of their children being in the hospital," Witt said. "It has been a success in past years, and we hope students will continue to donate their pop tabs."

Witt said all the pop tabs collected are donated to the Ronald McDonald House, which then recycles them. Because of the pure aluminum from which pop tabs are made, they are worth more than the actual can.

The Ronald McDonald House provides families of seriously ill children with an inexpensive place to stay while their children receive treatment at nearby hospitals. There are 197 Ronald McDonald Houses worldwide.

"Donating things makes students feel good," Witt said. "When they are helping those who are less fortunate, they feel like they are doing something to help the problem."

Dorothy Bridwell, volunteer at the Ronald McDonald House, said many groups participate in collecting pop tabs. She said all the money collected through the house's various fund-raising projects is used to

Frank discusses global economy, its consequences

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The American economy increasingly is becoming a global economy, Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., said Monday evening during his speech, "New Deal vs. Trickle-down: The International Context."

Frank, the representative from Massachusetts' 4th District, made the point that it has become impossible to define a foreign country because of the capitalist framework America is giving to the rest of the world.

"In today's economy, the world is in a situation where we can make anything anywhere and sell it to anyone," Frank said.

Frank said that with the rise of the capitalist economy, important parts of society have been diminished.

"The rise of capitalism has brought about wealth that has undermined the quality of life," Frank said.

Frank said that although capitalism has brought about needed wealth, he believes the American economy and the global economy can retain capitalism while eliminating the negative aspects of it.

"I understand that capitalism is the best way to create wealth," Frank said. "But I also understand that with capitalism it diminishes equality and undermines the values of life. These aspects can be saved while also preserving capitalism."

Frank said the American economy has been integrated with the rest of the world since the collapse of communism.

"It has long since been a tradition

Meaningful SILENCE

BY CRISTINA JANNEY

Future teachers, others join in sign language class to expand skills

The room is quiet, but someone is speaking.

Everyone hears, and some smile and laugh. They are making friends without words.

Members of a Manhattan sign language class introduced themselves in sign language at their first class Thursday night.

Lindsey Carney, senior in early childhood education, used finger spelling to say her name. Finger spelling is using hand signs for letters of the alphabet.

She said sign language is much harder to learn than it looks.

"I can pick up bits and pieces," she said. "I can get the gist of things."

Carney said she wants to get her master's degree in early childhood deaf education.

The first time she had to communicate with sign was at a camp for the deaf this summer.

Her signing abilities were not quite that of the campers and counselors.

"It was the first time in my life I felt like I had a disability per se," she said.

Carney and her teacher Susie Stanfield both were drawn into signing through their churches. Carney said she grew up watching her interpreter at church and thought it was beautiful.

Stanfield, who is a teacher for the deaf and hard of hearing with Manhattan-Ogden USD 383, first interpreted sign language in church for a friend her age who was deaf.

Steve and Kennita Tully were attending the class so they could better communicate with their son, Ray. The Tullys started using sign with Ray when he was just 1 1/2 to 2 years old. He is now in kindergarten.

"He's learned so much in school," Steve Tully said. "His vocabulary is becoming more advanced than ours."

Ray joined in the class by sharing the sign for his favorite toy — Pajama Sam. His sister, Zel, did the signs for "paper" and "beautiful."

Athletic department to add women's sport

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is looking to add a new intercollegiate sport for women.

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is working toward selecting a women's sport to adopt as part of an ongoing push to reach compliance with Title IX, the NCAA guideline that seeks to establish equality between men's and women's athletics.

Sports Information Director Kent Brown said the department hopes to reach a conclusion by the end of the spring semester.

"The plan right now is to make a decision on what sport or sports would be added this spring," Brown said. "At that point, we'll come up with a timeline to implement the sport as quickly as possible — to secure funding and all of the other things."

Cindy Fox, assistant athletics director, said the chosen sport could begin its inaugural season as soon as the 2000-01 school year. Still, Fox said implementation depends on logistical concerns.

"I would imagine (it would be added) within a year, during their next season," she said. "If it were a fall sport, it would be very difficult because you're looking at a short time frame. It would probably be the following season."

Fox said the department had not narrowed the field of possibilities at all yet. Virtually anything and everything that is considered to be a women's sport is fair game in the eyes of the administration.

Previously, Urick said the department was looking at archery, bowling, equestrian, lacrosse, riflery, soccer, softball and swimming and diving.

The many factors being weighed add to the complexity of the decision. A new sport will require substantial monetary and physical commitments, and the sports that can fulfill those requirements most easily will have an edge, Brown said.

"It involves facilities," he said. "What would have to be built? The competition in the Big 12 — are there other schools with the same sports? The numbers of participants in each sport, the cost of each sport, the coaches for each, would the athletes for the sport be recruitable in the state of Kansas, which is our main recruiting area? There are lots of things to be considered."

By those criteria, softball and soccer would seem to be strong candidates. Both sports feature large squads and would open a relatively large number of athletic opportunities.

Neither sport would involve purchasing an inordinate amount of equipment, and both are played throughout Kansas. Additionally, a softball team already would have a home when the new Frank Myers Field is completed to house the baseball team.

K-State is the only Big 12 school not to participate in soccer and one of two (the second being Colorado) not to field a softball team, something of which Fox said the administration was aware.

"Certainly, that has come up," Fox said. "Those are two very valid sports, and the Big 12 is very strong in both of those programs. It's a consideration, but we also have to look at what's best for Kansas State athletics."

At this point, K-State only plans to add one women's sport. However, Fox said another could follow a few years down the road as part of the university's ongoing efforts to reach compliance with Title IX.

The intercollegiate women's sports in which K-State now participates are basketball, volleyball, golf, tennis, rowing, track and field and cross country.

K-State colleges forced to reduce budgets to comply with Graves' statewide cuts

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the Kansas Legislature decided to cut the current state budget due to a revenue shortfall, trimming $2.2 million from K-State's budget, the only decision left for K-State was where to cut the spending.

The decision was left in the hands of the nine college deans, said Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance.

"Each college has a target figure, and it's up to each dean on how they are going to make the reduction," Rawson said.

Each college was told to reduce its general fund by 1 percent, reducing about $1.5 million from the Manhattan and Salina campuses and $700,000 from the Veterinary Medicine Center and from agriculture extension and research.

"Any effect it's going to have has been felt and been accounted for," Provost James Coffman said.

Coffman said the administration knew it was a possibility last fall that this situation would be likely, so it began a planning process.

Every college planned and handled the situation differently, and each college was affected differently.

"We are participating in a situation where the university has been told they cannot spend the money they have been given," said Stephen White, associate dean of arts and sciences.

The College of Arts and Sciences was asked to return $250,000 based on the shortfall. They are taking action primarily by cutting back on their operating expenses budget, which creates funds to buy supplies, travel, funds for hiring student workers, greenhouse maintenance and various other items and services.

The dean's office also is contributing money to pay the debt.

"We are not able to spend a certain amount of money we'd otherwise be able to spend," White said. "I think we're doing everything we can to accommodate students as best as we can given the situation."

"Departments are having to be innovative to find different ways to teach students and cover the shortfall."

White said he hopes the university will not be expected to return money to the state next year.

"The hope is that this is a one-time cut for K-State," White said.

Coffman said he is confident that next year will be better.

"The governor has clearly taken very positive steps to strengthen steps next year," Coffman said.

Gov. Bill Graves has proposed $21.2 million in extra spending for higher education for the state's 2001 budget year.

He said if the Legislature approves the governor's budget request, all cut-backs would return to normal.

The College of Agriculture took a different approach to the situation. Since it knew the shortfall was a possibility, it created an account for the 1-percent reduction.

"We did not leave the money in the Yugoslav defense minister shot, killed in restaurant

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Yugoslav Defense Minister Pavle Bulatovic was shot Monday in a Belgrade restaurant, officials and Belgrade media reported. Military officials said he died later in a hospital.

The independent Studio B television said Bulatovic, a Montenegrin who was close to Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic, was in the restaurant of the soccer club Rad when he and two other people were shot.

Military officials and those close to Bulatovic's Socialist Peoples' Party said the defense minister died in a Belgrade military hospital. The independent Beta news agency also said he had died.

Studio B said one or more attackers fired through a window of the restaurant, hitting Bulatovic and two other men from behind. They were taken to a military hospital.

The attack came less than a month after Serbia's most famed warlord, Zeljko Raznatovic, known as Arkan, was gunned down in a Belgrade hotel.

More than a dozen prominent people, some close to Milosevic, have been killed in Belgrade in the past decade. Most of the killings have never been solved or the culprits uncovered.

Bulatovic, 52, had been defense minister of Yugoslavia since 1994. He was a member of a pro-Serb faction in Montenegro loyal to Milosevic, who is Serbian.

Technical problems cause Yahoo! shutdown Monday

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Yahoo! Inc., which runs the most popular site on the Internet, suffered technical problems Monday and its flagship Web directory was inaccessible for much of the day.

The company issued only a short statement acknowledging the outage and promising, "We're working as quickly as possible to identify and correct the situation." Company officials were forced to deliver the admission by phone since their Web site was unavailable.

Yahoo said the problems began Monday about 1:45 p.m. EST. The problem also apparently prevented all the company's customers from accessing free e-mail accounts through the Web site but didn't affect customers' home pages on Geocities, owned by Yahoo.

Media Metrix, which tracks visitors to Web sites, said www.yahoo.com was the most popular Internet site for the month of December, the latest figures available, when it recorded 36 million visitors.

The failure didn't affect the company's stock Monday, when it traded close to where it had opened at nearly $353. Yahoo's market capitalization — the value of all its outstanding shares — is roughly $93 billion.

4 killed in plane collision over California golf course

LOS ANGELES — Two small airplanes collided in the air Monday, sending one craft crashing and burning onto a golf course and the other into trees across a freeway. At least four people were killed.

Golfer Danny Garza said he ran for his life.

"All I hear is like an explosion, and as I look up, I see this plane coming straight down, and it looks like it got entangled in some telephone wires," Garza told KNBC-TV. "And from then on, I just kept running, thinking that these telephone wires were going to fall on me."

Fire Capt. Steve Ruda said there were at least four dead, all from the planes. No one on the ground was hurt, authorities said.

One plane hit on the seventh hole of Cascade Golf Course, in the Sylmar section of Los Angeles about 25 miles northwest of downtown. The other fell on the opposite side of Interstate 5, the main north-south route between northern and Southern California.

The area is in the approach to Van Nuys airport. Several shaken motorists pulled over to the side of the freeway. Several people on the golf course and the freeway called 911 for help.

Fire Department spokesman Bob Collis said they were searching for a body in nearby hills. "Witnesses are saying that someone may have fallen out of one of the airplanes. Firefighters are trying to confirm that report," he said.

FAA operations officer Bruce Nelson confirmed two single-engine planes collided in the air. One was an experimental plane, the other was not immediately identified.

CLARIFICATIONS & corrections

There were some errors in Friday's Collegian.

The Bass-Leicht marriage will be in December 2000.

There were about 250 people who attended Sister Souljah last Thursday.

There was an error in Monday's Collegian. "Keeper of the Stars" was recorded by Tracey Byrd. Tracy Lawrence's new album is "Lessons Learned."

The Collegian regrets these errors.

for America not to need the rest of the world," Frank said. "With the collapse of communism, the willingness of many people to worry about the rest of the world collapsed."

Frank said the rise of the capitalist world has shifted the power in America away from the working class.

"Most of the good jobs went overseas."

"They did not go to the women and blacks of affirmative action or to the immigrants who come here from overseas, but there was a change in economics, due to the rise in capitalism worldwide," Frank said.

Matt Hoppock, freshman in secondary education, said he agreed with everything Frank had to say and understood many of his points.

"His opinions were excellent," Hoppock said. "They are exactly the same as mine."

Shannon Garretson, sophomore in speech pathology, said she went uncertain of what to expect of the lecture.

"I was not for sure what to expect from Barney Frank, but the points he made on all ends of the spectrum pleased me," Garretson said.

Frank said the key element to economics today is capitalism and the role it plays in global economics.

"Even though there isn't an international government there is an international economy, and capitalism has become international," Frank said.

Entomology graduate students place in top 3 at national contest

■ 5 win awards, honors against 300 competitors at Atlanta convention.

By STEPHANIE BONNELL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Sonny Ramaswamy, head of the Department of Entomology, said K-State entomology students are working hard to achieve national recognition.

K-State entomology graduate students placed among the top-three schools in the nation by earning awards for their projects related to the study of insects.

The students competed in a national competition sponsored by the Entomological Society of America during the society's national meeting in Atlanta in December.

Five K-State students won top awards while competing against more than 300 entomology graduate students from across the nation.

"These five graduate students bring tremendous honor to K-State," Ramaswamy said. "We are very proud of their accomplishments."

Clint Meyer, graduate student in entomology, was one of the students who participated.

He received second place for his oral presentation on behavior and ecology.

Meyer's presentation was "Secondary production and energetics of a dominant grass-feeding grasshopper in a tallgrass prairie." He compared the grasshopper production on burned and unburned pasture.

Insects affect all living things and make up 75 percent of all species, Meyer said.

"It was exciting to get to work on the Konza Prairie," Meyer said. "I got interested in entomology in my undergraduate degree in biology."

The research for these projects can take several months or several years to complete, Ramaswamy said.

Michael Flinn, graduate student in entomology, spent two years researching for his project.

Flinn won first place for his poster presentation for the host-plant resistance section.

"The projects were evaluated by a panel of judges," Ramaswamy said. "They selected the winners based on scientific content, rigor of the research, quality of the oral or poster presentation and a written paper."

At the competition, the students were awarded five out of 32 student research awards.

"K-State did awesome," Flinn said. "We were right at the top."

David Stagliano, graduate student in entomology, received first place for his oral presentation on behavior and ecology, Mohammad Ali Al-Deeb, a Fulbright Scholar, received first place for his poster presentation in crop protection, and Xuemei Yang, also a graduate student in entomology received second place for her poster presentation on physiology, biochemistry and toxicology.

More than 35 students are studying toward masters and doctoral degrees in entomology at K-State.

"The Graduate School offers supplemental stipend for top notch students for recruitment," Ramaswamy said. "Our entomology department is among the top 10 in the nation."

Manhattan provides library choice

By JASON BECK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Hale Library isn't going out of circulation, but some K-State students say the Manhattan Public Library has the answer to their Hale woes.

"It's quiet and a change of scenery," said Scott Cassity, senior in recreation and parks administration.

Cassity, who lives off-campus, said he goes to the Manhattan library on weekends to study. Cassity also said the research materials were easier to find than at Hale.

Although the Manhattan library is used primarily by local patrons and students from Manhattan High School, some K-State students, especially those who live off-campus, said they prefer the public library.

"It's just more convenient for me," said Donna Askew, senior in family studies and human services.

"It's a great way to get away from the noise."

Askew said she prefers to study and write papers at the public library because Hale often is busy and noisy, especially during finals week.

"There's always a lot of people there," she said.

Askew said parking also was a factor in going to the public library. Living off-campus, Askew said she found it easier to park at the public library than to drive to the K-State Student Union and walk to Hale.

The ease with which they could find materials at the public library also played a part in their decision to use it.

"When I was a freshman and a sophomore it was hard to find stuff," Cassity said. "It's quicker to find materials here."

Doug Miller, junior in mechanical engineering, said he also finds Hale Library confusing and crowded. However, Miller said he still prefers the on-campus library, especially the 24-hour study area, despite the crowds.

"It's crowded, but that's because it's an excellent place to study," Miller said.

However, Miller said the layout of Hale is confusing, and so are the search engines. Without a car, however, Miller does not often think about going to the Manhattan Public Library.

"I've thought about it, but I've never made it," Miller said.

Students who frequent the public library have not abandoned Hale completely, though. Askew said that even though she prefers the quiet of the public library, she still will go to Hale when she is already on campus.

Cassity also said he finds Hale a good place to do research now that he is older and understands the system.

"I still go there four or five times a week," Cassity said.

communicate with, and they have to learn a new language," Stanfield said.

Teaching and learning sign language is a lot about repetition, especially for young children, she said. "Just like a hearing child learns by hearing things over and over, deaf children learn by seeing over and over," Stanfield said.

Stanfield said even a seasoned signer can get lost easily.

"I'll miss a finger spelling for a word like 'did.' By the time I figured it out, I have missed the whole conversation," she said. "Then I feel like a total idiot that I didn't understand the word 'did.'"

Many people don't understand that sign language is a language in and of itself, Stanfield said. American Sign Language has its own word order and sentence structure.

"ASL has its own beauty to it," she said.

Manual Coded English sign language uses English grammar.

For example, a sentence in English might be "I am going to the store."

The ASL version would be "Store that one I go now."

"It is difficult to do it in print," Stanfield said. "A lot of sign language is gesture."

There also are often different signs for the same word.

Carney used one sign for backpack, and two other members of the class came up with slightly different signs for the same word.

"There are a lot of different styles," Carney said. "I thought there was just one way to sign, but there are different personalities of sign."

Soccer next step to Title IX compliancy

It's time to make women's soccer an NCAA sport at K-State.

Because K-State is not fully compliant with Title IX, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is in the process of selecting a new women's varsity sport to help bring K-State closer to compliance.

Title IX requires that there be gender equity in college sports and provides specific guidelines for that equity. It requires that participation opportunities, monetary allocations, facilities and services be substantially proportionate to enrollment.

Athletic Director Max Urlick said there are eight sports being reviewed as possibilities for implementation — archery, bowling, equestrian, lacrosse, riflery, soccer, softball and swimming and diving.

Because most of these sports have such limited appeal, only softball and soccer appear to be legitimate contenders. Softball had its chance at K-State but was eliminated as a varsity sport several years ago.

The time is now right to give soccer its chance.

Following the success of the U.S. Women's World Cup team last summer, the sport's popularity is at an all-time high. The excitement of the sport was enough to draw young female fans away from 'N Sync — if only for a short time — to watch the sport. This shows the potential of the sport.

In addition, soccer already has two things in its favor at K-State — fan base and athlete base. There already is a successful club team on campus, and the team can draw fans to its matches.

Although softball probably can do that to some degree, attracting thousands of fans to an equestrian event or bowling match is a long shot.

K-State is taking strides to become Title IX compliant. Now is the perfect time to prove the university's dedication to equality and adopt soccer as the new women's varsity sport.

► OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

I'd just like to thank Eric Dover for his letter to the editor in Friday's paper. I myself have had concerns about the use of my Social Security number.

Now that they're smoke free, let's try to make the residence halls roach free.

Does anyone else out there remember seeing Heinrich and Eckert smoking a couple of cigars for their victory celebration after getting elected?

I would say that 20 percent of students on campus are devout Christians and the Collegian's editorial board is 55 percent devout Christians. Is there anything wrong with this kind of skewed representation?

Calculus is killing my GPA.

Does anyone else think Jason Whitlock is trying to start a war?

The only thing more painful than chemistry is childbirth.

If you're single and depressed, Valentine's Day is just a really bad Monday.

If the Collegian dropped the Fourum, I'd drop all my classes.

Look at the bright side of K-State basketball. We can only go up from here.

It's disheartening to me to think that the men's basketball team is so bad that our newspaper would break from distinguished college journalism and devote its pages to more of the ra-ra let's support our team stuff.

Drunk drivers who put other peoples' lives at risk should not be allowed to represent this university in football. Period.

I'm entirely pro-choice, but every woman needs to choose nine months before the baby is due.

Don't make fun of parking services employees. Some of them are kind of cute.

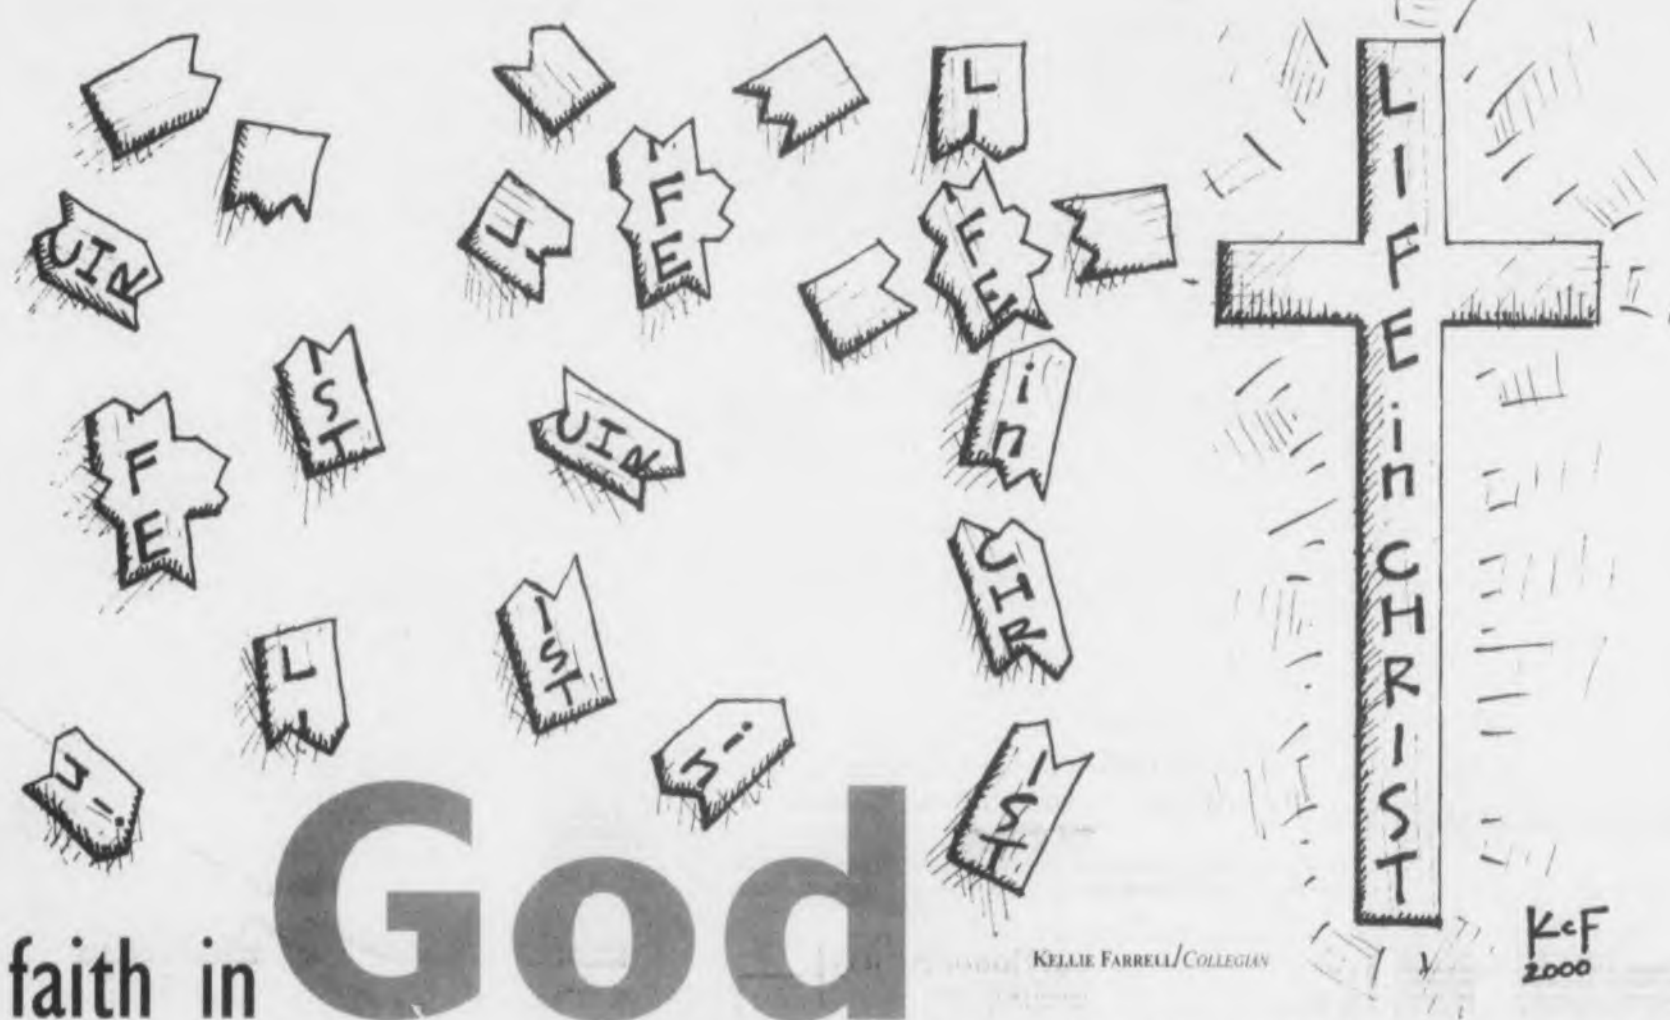

If KU fans are becoming unhappy with Roy Williams, we'll gladly trade them Asbury. Who do you think would get the better of the deal?

Thank God for the Cats' Den. Yet another place in the Union for me to buy a $90 sweatshirt.

If K-Rock wants a good morning show, they'd better get Howard Stern, because those new guys suck.

K-Rock's new morning show is the worst example of radio I've heard in my entire life.

We hope that both our men's and women's teams know that the real K-State fans are supporting them all the way.

It's been a bad week. An incident here, a mishap there is no big deal. After a while, they have a tendency to pile up. And when that pile gets too high, it all comes crashing down, which is what happened Sunday.

Let's just say it finally hit the fan.

When you fall into the trap of depending on worldly things like friends, a significant other or material possessions, you run the risk of severe disappointment.

When these seemingly secure footholds give away and you fall flat on your face, it's easy to feel like you're left with nothing.

That's how I felt earlier this week, until I realized I have everything.

God has a perfect way of chiseling away at our false dependencies until we are left clinging to the only thing that can get us through the hard times: Jesus.

Believing in Jesus is sometimes a hard thing to do because we're human and we naturally prefer fact rather than faith. It is much easier to believe in something tangible than it is to believe in something spiritual.

I've been a Christian all of my life, so I was raised in the church. My faith was never tested until I became a freshman in college and got to decide what was best for me.

I handled my newfound freedom by putting God on the backburner — I simply didn't want to think about him or feel any conviction whatsoever.

I partied a lot and spent a lot of week nights holding a beer instead of a textbook and, consequently, my grades were terrible.

Despite being deeply unsatisfied with life and searching for something real, this trend continued for two more years.

Then, everything changed. After going to a retreat with Christian Challenge last spring break, I began to feel conviction about my life again.

God, who I had suppressed for so long, had become real to me again, and I was the happiest I had been in a long time.

Even though I had been renewed through Christ because of his sacrifice on the cross, it was hard to convey these changes to my friends, who for so long had seen me do things contradictory to what I believed was right.

When you have lived a life of sin, and basically denied Christ through your actions, it's hard to pick up the pieces and speak the words in your heart that you know are so true.

The good thing is that, as a Christian, I don't have to worry about the things that I've done or the sins that I've committed.

According to Ephesians 2:8-9, "For it is by grace that you have been saved, through faith — and this is not from yourselves, it is the gift of God — not by works, so that no one can boast."

Christians are just as sinful as non-Christians. It only takes one sin to have eternal separation from God.

The difference is, Christians are saved because of their personal relationship with Christ, who paid the ultimate price for their sins. It is their relationship with Jesus that gets his people through their hard times.

You never can be too sinful to accept Christ into your life.

Paul, one of the key writers of the New Testament, persecuted and killed Christians before his conversion to Christianity.

Paul is the perfect example of God having a plan for our lives, despite the bad things that we've done.

In Jeremiah 29:11-12, it states, "For I know the plans I have for you," declares the Lord, "plans to prosper you and not to harm you, plans to give you hope and a future. Then you will call upon me and come and pray to me, and I will listen to you."

Even as a Christian, I still sin — a lot — and I have a bad habit of allowing my focus to drift away from Christ and fall on other things.

The good thing is, when these pseudo-comforts fade away, Christ still is there to pick up the pieces.

Women need to pay attention to issues, elect the right man president

I know everyone is aware of the political hype surrounding the next presidential race.

I also know most college-age students are not the least bit interested in the entire subject, but I think maybe we should be. Especially we women out there who have the opportunity to vote for a candidate who really has incentive to support our needs.

Females, by far, need to be more informed of this race. These candidates have some objectives regarding abortion that should not be taken lightly. This race is an opportunity to, as Sen. John McCain puts it, "empower women."

Choosing the wrong candidate might take us backward instead of forward. I want to discuss the four men who probably are regarded as the best of all of the hopefuls. Remember: this only is my opinion. Everyone obviously is entitled to their own.

Let us begin with the wealthiest of the pack. The wanna-be Marlon Brando of the American family, George W. Bush.

Besides his love for the Confederate flag, he also tends to give absolutely no support to abortion rights.

I am ecstatically happy to report that he recently was defeated at the New Hampshire primary by the underdog. McCain came out of the race with a 44 percent share over Bush's 39.3 percent. Now, South Carolina, a previous Bush-supporting state, has taken notice and turned its head toward McCain. Although I have not read up on his abilities to name heads-of-state and presidents of various countries around the world (anything is better than Bush's performance), I do know McCain is profoundly aware of the need for the empowerment of women.

Basically, this is Bush in a nutshell: the man is completely against abortion and finds reading a 500-page book on public policy boring. I believe that is enough said.

McCain, on the other hand, is working toward increased opportunities in the workplace in regard to females.

He also supports honorable treatment of women in the armed forces and biomedical research. The key to the biomedical research point is that he supports research in regard to breast cancer.

On the off-hand, McCain's campaign finance-reform plan is geared toward the fact that women are typically thought to be uninterested in issues such as war and aggression. This supposedly causes women not to vote. An attitude such as this has a real need for change. Women need to change it.

And Vice President Al Gore supposedly is committed to abortion rights. Whether this will remain an issue for him is yet to be seen, as is the case with all of the candidates, I suppose. I point this out because he has in the past voted for no Medicaid coverage of abortion. He since has reprimanded himself on this issue, though. He has fought against a Republican congress for years to protect the rights of American women.

Bill Bradley, the other democratic hopeful, might well have the best female intentions of all of the candidates (besides Donald Trump who seems to find no problem with women).

Bradley has impressed female powers such as Oprah Winfrey and Rosie O'Donnell so much they have allowed his ads to run during their shows. He, along with Gore, are popular with women viewers.

Bradley also picked up the endorsement of 600 abortion-rights activists in New Hampshire. The reason for this might lie within the fact that he abandoned his $65 billion-a-year health-care plan to support women. What can be wrong with that?

The choice is yours for this one people.

This is simply my biased little opinion that I hope might influence yours a bit. Women in America have no idea what an opportunity is sitting on the threshold of the future, and we need to take advantage of it.

This country needs someone in charge who does more for women than simply giving them a job under the desk.

Negotiations continue over hostages of hijacked Afghan plane near London

By ROBERT BARR
The Associated Press

STANSTED, England — Authorities waged hours of negotiations Monday with apparent Afghan dissidents holding a planeload of at least 150 people hostage at an airport outside London.

Officials did not disclose what political demands, if any, the hijackers put forth, but a diplomat familiar with earlier negotiations when the plane landed in Moscow said those holding the plane sought to free a prisoner held in the Afghan city of Kandahar.

Afghan media speculated the hijackers were Afghan dissidents who sought the release of Ismail Khan, a former regional governor who has been held since 1997 by Afghanistan's ruling Taliban movement. Khan is a member of Afghanistan's opposition alliance, which rules about 10 percent of the war-shattered country.

Once in Britain, the hijackers requested only food, water, unspecified medical supplies and that the lavatories on the Afghan state-run Ariana Airlines plane be emptied, said John Broughton, assistant chief constable of the Essex Police.

He characterized the negotiations, conducted in English, as "fairly calm and businesslike" and said authorities were patiently working toward a peaceful solution.

"Negotiations remain our favorite option," Joe Edwards, another assistant chief constable, said. "I will say it could be a very protracted technique. It could go on for days."

Mohammad Bashir Mahal, a passenger freed in Moscow, told reporters on Monday that the hijackers treated the passengers well.

"They were all young — around 25-30 years old, dressed in traditional Afghan costume — and to begin with they were threatening," he said in Pashtu. "But slowly, their aggression subsided and they treated us quite well. No one was beaten or insulted. Relations were good."

Broughton said eight captives released Monday at Stansted, Britain's designated airport for handling hijackings, said they were treated well while on board.

The Boeing 727 was seized by an unknown number of hijackers shortly after takeoff early Sunday on an Ariana flight from the Afghan capital, Kabul, headed to the northern city of Mazar-e-Sharif.

Before landing early Monday at Stansted, about 25 miles north of London, the hijackers freed 22 hostages in return for supplies during earlier stops in Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan and Russia.

Authorities said they could not confirm the nationalities of what were believed to be 157 hostages remaining on the airliner. They disclosed that one passenger has a serious kidney illness but said they did not know if that person was among those released.

As night fell, the plane remained parked about a half-mile from Stansted's main terminal, which still managed to operate at more than 80 percent capacity Monday.

Broughton said Britain's Foreign Office was working closely with several other governments but would not be more specific. He added that it wasn't Britain's policy to allow the aircraft to take off again once it landed.

Afghanistan's ruling Taliban said it would neither negotiate nor agree to the demands of the hijackers. A statement issued by the religious militia's supreme leader, Mullah Mohammed Omar, accused the head of an anti-Taliban alliance, Ahmed Shah Massoud, of masterminding the hijacking. The Taliban provided no evidence, however.

"We are watching this closely, waiting to hear what the demands are," Taliban Foreign Ministry spokesman Faiz Ahmed Faiz said in Kabul.

Though Afghanistan and Britain do not have diplomatic relations, Faiz said a Taliban representative in London was in contact with British authorities.

Clinton's $1.84 trillion budget meets GOP derision

By ALAN FRAM
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton sent Congress his budget finale on Monday, a $1.84 trillion plan to expand health care access, shrink the national debt and shower Democratic constituencies with election-year largesse.

Blessed with a budgetary bonanza that past presidents could only dream about — a projected $2.92 trillion in federal surpluses over the next decade — Clinton used his spending outline to propose something for almost everyone.

He would cut taxes for the sick, elderly, poor and college-bound; spend more for the environment, schools and gun-law enforcement; and erase the $3.7 trillion publicly-held portion of the national debt by 2013.

The proposal is sure to be heavily reworked by Congress, where defiant Republicans dismissed it as a gambit to bolster Vice President Al Gore's presidential bid and the Democratic drive to capture Congress. They promised to fatten the plan's tax cuts, trim its spending boosts and ignore its tax increases.

"It has all things for everyone they feel they'll need to get Al Gore elected president," said House Budget Committee Chairman John Kasich, R-Ohio, who called it "the president's fantasy budget."

"I look forward to working with the president in putting together a serious spending proposal," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Pete Domenici, R-N.M. "But this is a document designed to help Al Gore win election."

There was little denying presidential politics at the White House, where officials said at least a dozen Gore proposals were latticed into the outline. Beyond that, Clinton's farewell spending blueprint — for fiscal 2001, beginning Oct. 1 — was an effort to choose the terrain of this year's budget battle.

Clinton proposed $351 billion in tax cuts through 2010 that he argues can only be enlarged by eroding Social Security's trust funds, diluting efforts to expand and strengthen Medicare or slashing other popular initiatives such as hiring teachers or reducing the national debt.

"This budget, in short, makes really strong and significant steps toward achieving the great goals that I believe America should pursue in this new century," Clinton told reporters.

Republicans said that at a time of surplus, taxpayers should get a bigger break than Clinton wants to give them.

They criticized his proposal to raise other revenues by $181 billion during 10 years, including higher taxes on cigarettes and some corporate transactions. They noted that using Clinton's own figures, there would be a net $9 billion tax increase in 2001 and a $1 billion increase in 2002 before annual tax cuts begin to outweigh increases.

"Let me be very clear — this Congress will not raise taxes," House Majority Leader Dick Armey, R-Texas, said.

Strikingly, the president's budget boasted few initiatives that he has not proposed before.

Among the new ones was a $91 billion, 10-year effort to expand health coverage for working poor families. It is aimed at covering 5 million of the 44 million Americans who lack health insurance.

Cats confront mid-season concerns

IVAN KOZARI/COLLEGLIAN

K-State high jumper Heather Robinson attempts to clear the bar during a track meet Saturday in Ahearn Field House. K-State competed against Nebraska, Abilene Christian and Arkansas in the meet.

■ Injuries, eligibility status road blocks for track team.

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

The Cats are in the middle of the indoor track and field season and are coming off the K-State-Abilene Christian-Nebraska Triangular track meet.

Head coach Cliff Rovelto said he was pleased with the team's performance.

"I thought we competed very well — pretty much all of the women really did a good job," Rovelto said.

He also said the team, now a little more than a month from the national indoor meet, is battling injuries and eligibility concerns. Rovelto said once those athletes return from injury, the Cats' point levels will increase.

"If we had them in there, in terms of score it would have been a lot closer," Rovelto said.

Nebraska won the men's competition with 199 1/2 points.

The K-State men's team scored 127 points and finished third. The men's team has a limited amount of scholarships available, and Rovelto said the team has an estimated five runners competing on scholarship.

The men had first-place finishes Saturday from Sean Redmond, who won the 600 yards with a time of 1:12.10, and Tamel Sisney placed first in the shot put with a throw of 56 feet 8 1/2 inches.

Rovelto said it makes it hard to field a full team with such a limited amount of scholarships, but he said he expects things to improve in the spring.

Baseball season opens with wins

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

K-State opened the 2000 baseball season by winning two of three games during the weekend in the Spalding Baseball Fiesta Tournament in Albuquerque, N.M.

Overall, head coach Mike Clark said he was pleased with K-State's effort to begin the year.

"Coming out of this with two wins and one loss is a nice start to the season," Clark said. "Anytime you can go 2-1 on a weekend against Big 12 or Pac-10 caliber teams is good, particularly for as young and inexperienced as we are."

K-State opened the tournament Friday with a 7-6 victory against Oregon State. The Wildcats scored four runs in the final two innings to overtake the Beavers.

Senior starting pitcher Jason Wells kept Oregon State scoreless until the sixth inning before allowing three runs. Junior transfer Kelvin Day came on in relief to earn the win, throwing three scoreless innings and recording three strikeouts.

Senior second baseman Chad Tabor went 4-for-6 on the day, including the game winning hit to score junior shortstop J.D. Loudabarger in the bottom of the ninth inning. Freshman right fielder Joey Ammirato, in his college debut, drove in three runs to lead K-State.

The Cats did lose some power at the plate when senior third baseman and cleanup hitter Travis Andre injured his ankle. Clark said preliminary reports suggested Andre will be out of action three to six weeks.

In game two, the Wildcats were able to overcome a late Washington State rally to defeat the Cougars 9-7 Saturday.

K-State swung the bats consistently early in the game, scoring runs in five of the first six innings. Junior left fielder Kasey Weishaar had three singles in five at-bats and also knocked in four runs for the Wildcats. Tabor also had three hits, while junior first baseman Mark English, junior right fielder Ben Oleen, junior third baseman Josh Cavender and Loudabarger chipped in with two hits apiece.

Sophomore Butler County Community College transfer Luke Robertson pitched 5 2/3 innings to get his first win as a Wildcat. He gave up three runs on five hits, while striking out five and walking one.

K-State's success from the first two games didn't carry over to Sunday when Oregon State avenged its earlier defeat by hammering the Cats 16-2.

Freshman southpaw Derek Ver Helst was the first of three freshmen to pitch Sunday and took the loss for K-State despite allowing only six of the Beavers' 16 hits and three of the 16 runs.

"We sort of threw them into the fire, and we got burnt a little bit," Clark said.

Weishaar paced the Cats from the plate, going 2-for-4 with an RBI.

Cats set to face Sooners tonight

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

K-State might have caught No. 16/17 Oklahoma at a bad time.

When the Wildcats travel to Norman, Okla., tonight for a tip-off with the Sooners at 7, K-State will face a team that sits one game out of first place in the Big 12 Conference.

Not only are the Wildcats (8-12 overall, 1-8 Big 12) coming off an eight-game conference losing streak, but the Sooners (18-3, 6-2) have won the past four contests, including a 68-59 road triumph against Baylor on Saturday.

Meanwhile, Oklahoma senior Eduardo Najera is playing perhaps his best basketball of the season.

The 6-foot-8-inch forward was named Phillips 66 Big 12 Player of the Week on Monday after leading Oklahoma to two consecutive conference victories.

Najera recorded his 10th and 11th double-double of the season by averaging 19 points and 16 rebounds in the Sooners' win over Baylor and a 83-59 thrashing of then-16th ranked Texas.

The Chihuahua, Mexico, native also boasts a league-best six double-doubles in conference action, including the past five consecutive contests. In Big 12 games, he sits second in scoring (20.0 per game), first in rebounding (11.4 per game) and ranks sixth in steals (2.0 per game).

Najera has scored double figures in all 21 games for the Sooners this season, leading the team in both scoring and rebounding on nine occasions.

He rates as the fifth-leading candidate to win the 2000 John R. Wooden Award, given to the nation's most outstanding player, according to CBS SportsLine, www.cbssportsline.com. He is the Big 12's highest-rated player on the list.

Tennis team earns 2nd shutout weekend; Novotna dominates against Creighton

The K-State tennis team pitched a shutout last weekend.

The Cats ran their record to 3-2 on the season by posting the team's second consecutive shutout Saturday, 9-0 over Creighton.

K-State head coach Steve Bietau said he was surprised by how easily the Wildcats earned the victory.

"It wasn't a real tough match for us, as you can tell by the scores," Bietau said.

Despite the absence of No. 2 player Alena Jecminkova, who sat out singles matches because of the flu, the Wildcats dominated in singles, losing only one set. Freshman Petra Sedlmajerova and junior Natalia Farmer sparked the dominance, each recording 6-0, 6-0 wins.

Eva Novotna also was dominant in the victory, breezing to a 6-0, 6-1 singles win, Bietau could find little to fault in the junior's performance.

"Eva was very solid and aggressive in her matches," Bietau said. "She played very clean tennis."

Novotna also teamed with Sedlmajerova for an 8-2 rout in No. 2 doubles, leading the way for a Wildcat doubles unit that beat Creighton by a combined score of 24-8.

Coming into the match, Bietau had expressed mild concern at the matchups K-State would face against a competent Creighton doubles unit. The Wildcats curtailed his fears, however, starting and ending strong.

"I thought there were some places where they would really challenge us in the doubles, and that never really materialized," he said. "We started well immediately in doubles play."

Sedlmajerova said the team clicked in the win.

"I think we played really good," Sedlmajerova said. "Coach told us that the doubles would be pretty difficult, but I think we handled that pretty well."

Just three weeks into the season, this second shutout bettered their mark from all of last season, when they did not win a single 9-0 match.

The Wildcats will have to maintain their momentum through the next couple of weeks because they are off until they take on Tulsa at 6 p.m. on Feb. 18 in Manhattan.

Free agency pits Griffey against Seattle fans as he searches for new home base

For years, Ken Griffey Jr. has been a standout baseball player for the Seattle Mariners. Unfortunately for the ownership, and the Seattle fans, Griffey's contract expires at the end of this season, and he will become free to pursue a contract with any other team.

Griffey already has made it clear he does not want to play in Seattle after this season.

In an attempt to prevent losing Griffey to another team at the end of the season, the Mariners have decided to make Griffey available for trade. The battle to trade Griffey has been difficult and remains unresolved.

Through it all, many of Seattle's fans have pleaded with Griffey to keep playing for the team and city that has shown him so much support. Those requests have gone unheeded. Griffey will not play for Seattle once his contract expires.

It is for those loyal fans of Ken Griffey that I dedicate this modern-day version of "Casey at the Bat."

The scene looks rather sketchy for the Mariners today;

Ken Griffey's son, Ken junior, seems resolved to make them pay.

Free agency's the ghastly beast, the source of young Ken's might.

At season's end his contract's up; he's likely to take flight.

The Mariner's have tried, my friend, to trade Ken 'fore the day. His contract ends, and he begins to pack and walk away.

But trading is no easy task when Junior's in the mix.

He's worth 10 times as much as any team can care to risk.

The team has worked for weeks on end to get Ken's transfer made.

But Griffey gets to veto any team who wants to trade.

He's narrowed down his list of teams he'll play for to just one:

The Reds of Cincinnati are the team for Senior's son.

But bless their souls, the Mariners, or M's as they are called,

Have seen negotiations for young Griffey become stalled.

The Reds would like to add him to their lineup and make peace,

But Cincinnati does not want to part with Pokey Reese.

So now the M's, and Griffey too, are forced to sit and wait, Until the Reds can offer up a trade worth Junior's weight.

For years he's been the hero there, for years he's been their man,

So they refuse to trade without another standout in the plan.

But through it all the Mariner's would love to have Ken stay.

The fans come out in droves to watch the brilliance of his play.

When Ken steps up to take a pitch the crowd stops where they're at.

They'd give up everything to see one swing of Griffey's bat.

But despite Seattle's loyal love Ken Griffey's want stays true;

He will not play in Washington once this season is through.

He wants to move much closer to his family and his friends,

And moving from Seattle is the means to Griffey's ends.

The Royals said if Griffey signed with them then they just might Give young Griffey millions and their team's ownership rights.

On this point Ken barely thought and said without demur —

"I'd hardly want to own a team worth less than I am, sir."

Then the Braves decided it was time to make their bet,

The M's would get John Rocker, a fire-throwing vet.

Junior quickly turned it down — said, "This is quite bizarre,"

"I'd hate to see the headlines read 'A bigot for a star!'"

So one by one each owner made a bid for Griffey's trade,

And one by one each team was left without a trade deal made.

And one by one each fan of Ken begs for his pledge to stay.

But through and through he makes it known his will, will not be swayed.

Oh, somewhere in fair Washington the sun is shining bright

The kids are playing somewhere, and somewhere hearts are light

And somewhere there are teams where the players aren't in doubt Seattle knows no pleasure — Mighty Griffey has sold out.

Health QUESTION

By: Carol Kennedy
director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center

Q: How many hours of sleep should students get?

A: Students should get 7 1/2 to 8 hours of sleep every night.

The exact functions of sleep are not known, however, experts report sleep is essential. Inadequate sleep, or sleep deprivation, can lead to sleepiness, decreased attention span and performance impairment — for instance, falling asleep in class.

In general, it is not possible to catch up on lost hours of sleep. The effects of self-imposed sleep deprivation resolve when adequate hours of sleep are obtained on a regular basis.

To have your sex/health question answered by a professional, e-mail the Collegian at arts@pub.ksu.edu. Questions will run every Tuesday.

Lafene Health Center provides shots to help students retain health, fight disease, illness

STORY BY RAEGAN TONEY

The word "shots" strikes fear in the hearts of many. The thought of someone sticking a long needle into one's arm or worse, one's rear, does not thrill many people, but some people actually get shots voluntarily.

There are vaccines for just about everything — flu, chicken pox, meningitis and even Lyme disease. Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center, said students are getting vaccinated voluntarily to prevent these diseases and illnesses.

"It's a decision that an individual has to make on where they want to spend their health-care dollars and take into consideration what risks they have in their life," Kennedy said.

While K-State does not require students to turn in formal immunization records, Lafene does recommend students submit their records to the center when they enroll. A letter is sent to all new students recommending immunizations they might want to get.

Sonya Conrad, staff nurse for the Allergy and Immunization Clinic at Lafene, said Lafene has just about every immunization available and is more than willing to help.

Kennedy said students in group-living situations, such as residence halls and greek houses, should consider getting a shot called pneumovax. Pneumovax helps prevent illnesses such as pneumonia and meningitis.

"These are more important for students who have something like asthma or something that might compromise the immune system," Kennedy said.

With spring nearing, people start to go outdoors, and Kennedy said students should consider getting a Lyme disease vaccination. Lyme disease is an infection caused by a bacteria that is transmitted by the bite of deer and western black-legged ticks.

Kennedy said the risk of getting Lyme disease is mainly associated with wooded and overgrown areas. The risk is minimal to none in central and western Kansas and a low risk in eastern Kansas and Missouri. Areas in Michigan and the northeast are high risk areas for the disease.

The Lyme disease vaccine is a series of three shots, and Kennedy said people should plan ahead if they plan to go to woody areas for any recreational activities. The first shot is given in January, February or March. The second is given a month after the first, and the final shot is given within 12 months of the first.

The most well-known, and probably most-feared, shots are the tetanus and MMR, or measles, mumps and rubella.

"An MMR shot should be the last that you're given," Kennedy said. "Tetanus is usually already up to date."

Kennedy said a tetanus shot is continued through a person's adult life and should be given every eight to 10 years.

"It's a decision that an individual has to make on where they want to spend their health-care dollars and take into consideration what risks they have in their life."

— Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene short shots

Who needs to get a shot? Here is a list of shots, who should get them and how many to get.

■ Tetanus and diphtheria toxoids combined

All adults. All adolescents should be assessed at 11-12 or 14-16 years and immunized if no dose was received during the previous five years.

Two doses 4-8 weeks apart and a third dose 6-12 months after the second.

■ Influenza vaccine

Adults 65 and older. Residents of nursing homes or other facilities for patients with chronic medical conditions. Women in second or third trimester of pregnancy during flu season. People 6 months to 18 years of age receiving long-term aspirin therapy. Groups, including household members and caregivers who can infect high risk persons.

Given annually, each fall.

■ Measles and mumps vaccines

Adults born after 1956 without written documentation of immunization on or after first birthday. Health-care personnel born after 1956 who are at risk of exposure to patients with measles should have documentation of two doses of vaccine on or after the first birthday or of measles seropositivity. HIV-infected people without severe immunosuppression. Travelers to foreign countries. Persons entering post-secondary educational institutions.

At least one dose. Two doses if in college, in a health-care profession or traveling to a foreign country with second dose at least one month after the first.

■ Hepatitis B vaccine

Persons with occupational risk of exposure to blood or blood-contaminated body fluids. Clients and staff of institutions for the developmentally disabled. Hemodialysis patients. Recipients of clotting-factor concentrates. Household contacts and sex partners of those chronically infected with HBV. Adoptees from countries where HBV infection is epidemic. Certain international travelers. Injecting drug users. Men who have sex with men. Heterosexual men and women with multiple sex partners or recent episode of a sexually transmitted disease. Inmates of long-term correctional facilities. All unvaccinated adolescents.

Three doses: Second dose one to two months after the first, third dose four to six months after the first.

Lafene offers variety of health-care options

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students who feel ill can go to Lafene Health Center for almost any condition that is not life-threatening.

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene, said students might not be aware of the comprehensive services available at Lafene.

"We offer more services than typical doctors' offices," she said.

Besides going to Lafene to find out what virus or bacteria is causing illness, Lafene services also include x-rays, laboratory testing, a pharmacy, a registered dietitian, a women's clinic and health education. One of the only drawbacks to Lafene is that it is closed at night and on Sundays, Kennedy said.

Kennedy said if students feel their illness or injury can't wait, they should go to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue.

Larry Couchman, Mercy emergency department director, said the main difference between Lafene and Mercy is that Lafene is a clinic and Mercy is a hospital.

"We get a lot of students that come in for services in our emergency department," he said. "Some of those services potentially could be handled at Lafene, but due to hours at Lafene, they wouldn't be able to access those services."

Kennedy said if students are sick when Lafene is closed, they should call their parents for advice about whether to go to Mercy's emergency room or wait until Lafene opens because of the cost.

However, she said students shouldn't let the cost of health care keep them from getting help.

Beth Tolentino, Mercy community relations assistant, said students wouldn't be able to call the emergency room to ask for advice.

"We can't dispense medical advice over the phone," she said. "But they can come to the emergency room, because that's open to everyone in the community."

Kennedy said it's difficult to say what illnesses or injuries require someone to go to Mercy and what illnesses or injuries Lafene can treat.

"It's just not a black-and-white issue," she said.

Kennedy said it's important that students use good judgment. She said in one instance, a K-State student was feeling quite ill, but her friends recommended that she not go to Lafene. The woman had appendicitis but didn't know. She couldn't get an immediate appointment with any physicians in Manhattan.

"Out of desperation, she came to Lafene and was transported to the hospital because she was so sick," Kennedy said.

If Lafene can't treat students' illnesses or injuries, the staff will refer them to a specialist or transport them to Mercy if immediate help is needed, Kennedy said.

"Students shouldn't be afraid to come to Lafene for care because our physicians are very competent," she said.

Student juggles family of 4 with K-State life

Jeff Cooper/Collegian
Karen Hynek, senior in business education, helps her son Connor with his homework in their Hanover, Kan., home before she leaves for Linn High School, where she student teaches.

By SARAH SOURK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ready by 6 a.m., wake the children by 7, feed them, start the laundry, take the children to school and then comes the hour-long commute to a 9:30 a.m. class.

This is just the start of an average day for Karen Hynek, senior in business education.

Hynek is a nontraditional student, wife and mother of four. Hynek said a nontraditional student is someone with different circumstances than the rest of the student body.

Although this might seem out of the ordinary, Adult Student Services director Nancy Bolsen said nontraditional students make up 19.3 percent of the Manhattan and Salina campuses.

Hynek said nontraditional students bring diversity and life experiences to the campus, but they do not have it any harder than traditional students.

"K-State is a friendly and inviting campus for non-traditional students," Hynek said. "I was able to get involved and had a wonderful time."

Hynek is involved in many activities at K-State; she is serving as the vice president of the business education club.

"Being active helped me get a feel for the campus and for campus life," Hynek said.

Anyone who is 25 years or older, married, has children or has been out of school for several years is considered a nontraditional student, Bolsen said.

"It could be a 17-year-old with a child or a 65-year-old grandfather who wants to continue his education," Bolsen said.

Bolsen said Adult Student Services offers numerous services to nontraditional students, one of which is scholarship information.

"The students can come in and we have an accordion file they can look in," Bolsen said. "There are also two large three ring-binders full of scholarship possibilities."

Hynek said she qualified for several scholarships due to the help of adult student services.

Hynek was awarded a $5,000 Kansas Teacher Scholarship from the Kansas Board of Regents. She also received an additional $1,800 from other various scholarships.

"I paid very close attention when scholarships were due," Hynek said. "I prioritized the due dates and completed local and state scholarships first."

Adult Student Services often works in corporation with the Office of Student Financial Assistance. Bolsen said there are thousands of scholarships available, but people must be willing to put the time and effort into finding them.

"A student can come in and we will spend 15 to 20

Dartmouth plan receives criticism from KSU greeks

By TAMARA MANN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dartmouth College's greek system now is dealing with recommendations from the Board of Trustees that eventually could end greek life at the school. But members of the K-State greek system said they feel they have no reason to worry that they could ever face a similar situation.

"The difference between K-State greek life and Dartmouth's is like night and day. We have not had any of the risk-management violations or concerns that they have had. Also, our percentage of diversity within the greek organizations is very similar to that of the rest of the campus percentages," Barb Robel, K-State Greek Affairs adviser, said.

Matt Killingsworth, junior in mass communications and member of Delta Chi at K-State, said Dartmouth's proposals are a quick fix to a problem that should have been dealt with at an earlier stage.

"I really think that Dartmouth just let things get out of hand. It seems that issues that should have been dealt with were either somewhat ignored or handled poorly," he said. "Now, instead of dealing with the problem, they are just trying to eliminate it. It seems as if they have more problems than they know what to do with."

In contrast to the release of the student-life initiative launched in February 1999 at Dartmouth College, a new report from the school recommends that its single-sex fraternities and sororities be allowed to survive, though not as they have for generations.

The new report recommends reform of Dartmouth's greek system. The report was an update to Dartmouth's Board of Trustees' original announcement to make residential and social life substantially coeducational.

The new standards will change organizational practices, selection and initiation practices, residence and membership requirements and physical standards for facilities.

"If it is to survive, the system must change significantly," the report said.

It recommends that rush take place in the winter term of sophomore year and be less exclusive.

Robel said although recruitment is a stressful time, going through it as a freshman is a beneficial experience.

"The primary benefit of the current rush system is that it provides an immediate support group for students," she said.

Cristy Welsh, sophomore in mass communications and member of Chi Omega at K-State, said recruitment is somewhat stressful because recruits do not know anyone, but she said she did not think it would work if everyone knew each other.

"I can't imagine what it would be like to know everyone. I think it would naturally create bias due to the fact that you do know everyone," she said.

The Dartmouth report also recommends elimination of the pledge period and only allowing seniors and four junior officers to live in chapter houses. In order for a greek organization at Dartmouth to be recognized by the school, the board's recommendations must be met.

As part of the new governance requirements at Dartmouth, the separate fraternity and sorority judiciary system also would be discontinued.

K-State Sigma Nu president Brian Fisher said he thinks the elimination of a separate judiciary system like the one K-State has in the Interfraternity Council for fraternities and Panhellenic Council for sororities would be a great loss.

"I think that Greek Affairs serves as a great buffer, or liaison, between greeks, students, faculty and advisers," he said. "The role they hold creates an overall positive impact for the K-State community."

Dartmouth suggested that the trustees revisit the issue in five years to determine whether the greek houses have made enough progress to be allowed to go on.

Roland Adams, public affairs officer at Dartmouth, said for now, the system remains intact at the school.

"These are now currently only recommendations and will possibly begin being implemented in the spring," he said.

the plan

The student-life initiative at Dartmouth College calls for enhanced residential and social life on its campus. There are five principles advocated by the plan.

- There should be greater choice and continuity in residential living and improved residential space.
- There should be additional and improved social spaces controlled by students.
- The system should be coeducational, providing opportunities for greater student interaction.
- The number of students living off campus should be reduced.
- The abuse and unsafe use of alcohol should be eliminated.

NFL star Derrick Thomas dies

■ Doctors suspect blood clot as cause of unexpected turn.

MIAMI — Pro football star Derrick Thomas, paralyzed from the chest down less than a month ago in a car wreck on an icy road, died Tuesday. He was 33.

Thomas was being transferred from his hospital bed to a wheelchair on his way to therapy when he uttered something to his mother and his eyes rolled back, said Dr. Frank Eismont, a neurosurgeon at Jackson Memorial Hospital.

"We were hoping that Derrick's story would have been a happier ending," he said. "This is very much unexpected."

The Kansas City Chiefs' linebacker, who held the NFL record of seven sacks in a single game, went into cardio-respiratory arrest, he said.

Doctors have not determined a cause of death and might perform an autopsy. One of Thomas' doctors, Dr. Barth Green, said Thomas likely suffered a massive blood clot.

"This is a total shock," Green said. "Derrick was an extraordinary person and was breaking all the records while he was here."

A shaken Chiefs coach Gunther Cunningham recalled telephoning Thomas at the Miami hospital from the Pro Bowl on Sunday in Hawaii, after seeing players and fans honoring Thomas by wearing his number. Thomas had played in nine Pro Bowls but was not selected for this year's game.

"Derrick said, 'Coach, be strong.' He never told me how strong I needed to be," Cunningham said.

News shocks KC fans who mourn loss of hero

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Stunned Kansas City Chiefs fans mourned the death of linebacker Derrick Thomas on Tuesday morning.

At Crown Center, the word was just making its way through shops. Shopkeepers who had televisions were passing the news along to those next door.

People were stopping in their tracks, saying they couldn't believe what they were hearing. The mall turned silent.

At Pro Image sporting goods, Eric Braden and Tavokeyius Stanley, both teens from Kansas City, Kan., were shaking their heads, muttering, "That's messed up."

"It's disappointing," Braden said. "I thought he would be all right."

Stanley was shocked, saying Thomas was his favorite player and never thought he would die.

"It's a tragedy losing a legend," Mike McCown, a Pro Image employee, said. "He went way too early."

"He was definitely a crowd pleaser — not only on the field, but off."

McCown said a lot of people were coming in asking about Thomas. Replica jerseys from the Chiefs' linebacker were going for $150.

Stephanie Rahn, of Kansas City, Mo., was walking through Crown Center on a way to a medical exam. She said she stopped in her tracks when she heard the news.

"Kansas City's going to mourn. Everybody loves the Chiefs. It doesn't matter if they win or lose," Rahn said.

In Jefferson City, the state capital, the Missouri House and Senate each paused for a moment of silence.

Sen. Bill Kenney, R-Lee's Summit and a former Chiefs quarterback, announced Thomas' death to his colleagues.

"Derrick Thomas was a true hero. He will be missed

2 airplanes collide over lot; 1 crashes into hospital roof

ZION, Ill. — Two small planes collided Tuesday over a hospital parking lot, and one plane crashed onto the roof of the medical center.

Some employees of Midwestern Regional Medical Center suffered slight burns, but no patients or workers were killed, said Roger Cary, hospital president. He would give no further information.

Witness Les Mussared said he was standing in a parking lot near the hospital when the planes crashed.

"I looked up because I heard a gurgling noise. I saw two small planes collide in the air — they pulled away from each other," Mussared said.

One plane started diving like it had no power and then crashed into a nearby street, Mussared said. The other came down on the roof of the hospital, blowing out windows on the top floor and creating billows of smoke.

The crash occurred at 3:10 p.m. CST, said Martha Vercammen, a Federal Aviation Administration duty officer. She had no information on injuries or fatalities.

Suspect hides in jet factory, arrested on robbery charges

EVERETT, Wash. — A bank-robbery suspect being chased by police fled into an enormous Boeing jet factory Tuesday and hid in the world's largest building for 10 hours before he was found in a crawl space.

The man ran away from police about 2 a.m. PST after crashing a car on a freeway near the factory, where 747, 767 and 777 jets are assembled.

The police search forced Boeing to evacuate much of the factory, and some workers were told to stay home for the day. Work continued on finished planes being prepared for delivery, Boeing spokesman Doug Webb said.

The suspect was arrested on charges of robbing a Wells Fargo Bank in nearby Lynnwood of an unspecified amount of cash. His name was not released.

The factory, 25 miles north of Seattle, covers 98 acres. It is considered the largest building in the world by volume, and its interior is a bewildering maze of catwalks, ductwork, overhead cranes, shops of widely varying sizes and nine work stations where aircraft are assembled.

Webb said 2,000-3,000 workers typically are in the plant during the graveyard shift and about 10,000 on weekday shifts. Total employment at the complex is about 20,000.

After the bank robbery, sheriff's deputies spotted a vehicle matching the description of the getaway car and followed it. The car crashed soon after, and the driver jumped a fence and ran into the plant with a handgun.

A nearby school canceled classes for the day.

House rejects smoking ban for public-school grounds

TOPEKA — Efforts to ban smoking on all public-school grounds in the state were shot down by the House.

The chamber voted 72-42 against an amendment to a bill Tuesday.

The amendment was offered by Rep. Larry Campbell, R-Olathe.

"It puts a ban on smoking on school property, period," Campbell told the chamber, where opposition came quickly.

Much of the opposition centered on the idea that such a ban should be left to local school boards.

Rep. Susan Wagle, R-Wichita, said it could apply to outdoor sporting events and could deter parents from attending.

"If you want to see school violence, just outlaw smoking in teachers' lounges," said Rep. Ed McKechnie, D-Pittsburg.

The bill, outlawing the sale of cigarettes intended for overseas distribution in Kansas, won tentative approval on a voice vote. A final vote of approval is needed to send the bill to the Senate.

Students press for scrutiny of UPenn apparel production

PHILADELPHIA — About a dozen University of Pennsylvania students occupied the lobby of the school president's office for a second day Tuesday to press for closer scrutiny of working conditions in factories that produce clothing with the Penn name.

After meeting with the students, President Judith Rodin said she planned to wait for a report from a committee that will recommend how such labor conditions should be monitored and propose a code of conduct for manufacturers.

Protests at other campuses nationwide have brought changes in universities' arrangements with apparel manufacturers.

Last year, Penn joined more than 100 other schools in the Fair Labor Association, an organization of apparel manufacturers and retailers that monitors working conditions.

TAKE note

Software grant. An electronic-commerce software grant will provide K-State students with a competitive edge when they seek employment.

Yar Ebadi, dean of the College of Business Administration, said the software will provide students with the experience sought by employers.

The Merant Corp., a specialist in the e-commerce software industry, awarded the College of Business Administration nearly $150,000 for e-commerce software and training in a university environment.

The grant's author was Roger McHaney, assistant professor of management information systems. He said Merant's niche in the software market is analogous to the front window of a retail store.

"Merant takes a company's COBOL histories and makes a front-end for them," McHaney said. "They help companies who don't want a complete overhaul. Merant creates an e-commerce Web front for a company who doesn't want to have to create a whole new site."

McHaney said the grant process actually was initiated by Paul Halperin of Merant. McHaney said Halperin made sure the academic program at the College of Business Administration is compatible with the software.

'Who Wants to Be a Millionaire,' Philbin bring friends together

By JUSTIN SCHUSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The clock shows 7:50 p.m. Four women have congregated in West Hall 422. Three of them are sitting on the bed, and one is on the floor next to the bed knitting a purple-and-white afghan.

The clock inches toward 8 p.m., the starting time of an event that brings the women together three nights a week.

Finally, the top of the hour arrives and someone reaches for the remote to turn the channel to ABC. Regis Philbin is there to greet the women, and they chorus in on Philbin's phrase, "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?"

These nights in West Hall usually begin the same way.

"We yell down the hall that 'Millionaire's' on," Amanda Irvin, sophomore in elementary education, said.

Irvin said she meets with her friends on Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday nights to watch the show. The women actively participate in the show by calling out the answers to the questions and often times yelling at those who are about to make a mistake.

They plead for a contestant to pick "log" as the answer to the question "Which of the following objects is needed to engage in the sport of birling?"

The contestant does, and successfully moves on to the next question.

Even though the women all agree on the appeal of the show, they each have favorite parts.

"I personally like how average people get the chance to win large amounts of money for having otherwise useless knowledge," Irvin said. Rachel Akins, senior in elementary education, said she likes the suspense of the show.

"You never know when someone's going to win the million dollars," Akins said.

Tricia Horton, junior in agricultural pre-veterinary medicine, said, "I just think it's interesting to watch the people that come on."

The girls have even become quite accomplished imitators of Philbin, the show's host. Horton said Philbin is what keeps the show so popular.

Irvin said she has been trying to get on the show ever since it started. She calls in every day to try her luck with the process.

During the call-in application, Irvin said you are given three questions of increasing difficulty. You get 10 seconds to answer each question, and if you succeed in answering all three correctly, you are placed in a random drawing to pick who goes on to the show in New York.

"If Amanda gets on the show, I'm going with her, because she doesn't want to use me as a lifeline," Adele Fuhrmann, sophomore in elementary education, said.

Fans who need more than just the show to satisfy their "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?" cravings have a few other options.

There is a computer game where fans can hone their trivia skills. Irvin said the show also has its own Web site where fans can check on air times of upcoming shows and biographies of the winners. The Web site can be found at abc.go.com/primetime/millionaire/mill_home.html. You can also play a version of the game online.

"They even have the music," Irvin said.

For the four women at West, the appeal of "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?" seemingly has not transferred to its prime-time game show peers like "Greed" and "Twenty-One."

"I think they're rip-offs,"

REED DUNN/COLLEGIAN

Amanda Irvin, sophomore in elementary education; Adele Fuhrmann, sophomore in elementary education; Tricia Horton, junior in agricultural pre-veterinary medicine; and Rachel Akins, senior in elementary education, respond to the answer of the $8,000 question during the 48th episode of "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?" The women gather on the fourth floor of West Hall three days a week to watch the show.

Irvin said.

She believes the spinoff shows are running from the popularity of "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?"

Not all students on campus are as anxious to watch the show as the four women in West. Marc Maddox, junior in English and anthropology, said he hates the show.

"It's the pseudo-intellectual game show of tomorrow," Maddox said. "It seems to be geared for an audience that was weaned off of Jerry Springer and 'The Price is Right.'"

Wichita-based PBS affiliate's program airs student-made videos

Public-affairs issues subject of class' work.

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students in the Advanced Electronic News Reporting class cannot search the Internet for it at 3 in the morning.

They cannot rely on projects that their friends lend them.

Their project this semester requires more than procrastination and last-minute attempts to get it done - it will be viewed by a statewide audience wanting to learn more about issues in the state of Kansas.

"I don't want people to look at us as student journalists, but as serious, genuine newscasters," Jennifer O'Neill, junior in electronic journalism, said.

O'Neill is in the class and is required to participate in a new project: producing videos for KPTS-TV, a PBS affiliate in Wichita. Although this station is celebrating its 10th year in Wichita, it's the first time Manhattan has aired it.

The videos air once a week on KPTS in the program "Kansas Week," and they focus on topics that deal with state legislative issues. The program is not geared toward K-State something Tom Grimes, associate professor of journalism and instructor for the class, said students need to realize.

"The biggest challenge is trying to take complex ideas that they don't necessarily have to deal with every day and become familiar enough with them so they can explain them to a large state-wide audience. That's hard to do," Grimes said.

"Most students are concerned about things most adults aren't concerned with," Grimes said. "They're going to have to care about them and represent them correctly and fairly."

Although this project was not originally included in the curriculum, O'Neill said she was excited about the project.

"There's so many challenges since it's so early," she said. "It's a big opportunity for me and the class. We'll get out of it what we put in."

Students in this class send weekly videos to Dale Goter, director of production and public affairs at KPTS.

He tells students what topics he wants them to cover, and said he hopes students can get into the Topeka Statehouse for interviews.

"Hopefully, if students participate in this, it would give them a real-life experience and we would benefit from those pieces like the one that aired on Friday," Goter said. "It would benefit the viewers by bringing them information about the state."

Goter said students in the future would benefit from this participation.

"We want to work on continuing to improve on the quality of the productions so they can have multimillion-dollar careers and donate lots of money to public TV," he said.

Another program featured is "What's the Big Idea?"

Lori Bergen, assistant professor of journalism, is the show's executive producer, writer and host. Unlike "Kansas Week," this program focuses on K-State.

"The idea, originally, was to highlight the research, the scholarship, the creative endeavors, the important activities that are supported by the university and make all that available to a statewide audience," Bergen said.

The weekly, 30-minute program could include Landon and Lou Douglas lectures, in addition to coverage on discoveries and political or cultural issues. Grimes said it examines the important ideas that come out of K-State.

It is aired locally, but every fourth program runs statewide. There is no budget because the Educational Communication Center, located in Dole Hall, is obligated to provide these services for K-State, which is overseen by the office of the provost.

Unlike "Kansas Week," this program does not incorporate a class. Bergen decides the material, the format and the music for the program. She said the complexity of the production is the biggest challenge, but she said it is rewarding because she meets so many interesting people.

"Part of it is the opportunity to learn a lot about the things you're curious about," she said. "There are ideas I would never come in contact with otherwise."

These rewards also are available to students in the Advanced Electronic News Reporting class, but that is where Grimes draws the line.

"It's limited to this class at this point because these students will talk to hundreds of thousands of Kansans this week," he said. "We want to make sure they know what they're talking about."

O'Neill produced one of the first videos, which focused on tuition increase.

"This isn't just going to be another project for class," she said. "This is getting into the real stuff. We can take this real far."

Lafene deserves privilege-fee increase

Student Senate should grant a privilege-fee increase to Lafene Health Center.

Although no such proposal has even reached senate, one inevitably will invade a meeting in the near future. Senators should not overlook it when it arrives.

Lafene occasionally has had a negative light shone upon it, earning nicknames such as "Lafene Student Death Center." But it consistently has shed such stereotypes. By offering such services as free doctor visits, a women's clinic, low-cost prescriptions and lab work, Lafene has made itself a valuable resource at K-State.

Because of recent financial troubles — which were highlighted by the Lafene audit last year — the center undoubtedly will seek an increase in student privilege fees within the next year. If this fails, it will be forced to charge students on a per-visit basis in order to remain operational.

The cost per visit, which now is free, most likely would be somewhere in the vicinity of $25. Such a cost would be outrageous for students who need to make frequent visits to Lafene.

Surveys about Lafene have found that 66 percent of students have used Lafene. A minimal hike in the campus privilege fee would be worthwhile for two-thirds of the student body, although it would be an added burden to the remainder of students.

However, no one can be quite sure when they will need to visit Lafene for some reason. It is better for all students to pay a small cost for services they might use than to pile costs on unfortunate students who have need for constant medical attention.

Senate should bear this in mind and approve an increase in the campus privilege fee when a request reaches them.

Supernatural Law:

Natural Law Party promotes religion as public policy

It's big. It's wealthy. It promotes its own religious beliefs as science. It's practically synonymous with a certain political party, and its zealous followers turn out in droves to vote.

I could easily be talking about the religious right and the GOP, but I'm not. I'm talking about transcendental meditation and the Natural Law Party.

I looked into TM and the NLP a few years ago but had practically forgotten what I read until last week, when a young man with a clipboard stopped me as I was going into the K-State Student Union.

He was taking signatures to get the NLP on the ballot in Kansas. He told me it was an independent third party and that it was endorsed by Greenpeace.

I hadn't heard about this last part. The environment being one of my top concerns, I was tempted to sign the petition. But I knew something he hadn't heard.

"The NLP is associated with transcendental meditation, right?" He gave me a blank look. He hadn't even heard of transcendental meditation, he said.

If I had been confident about the connection, I'd have discussed it with him, but I wasn't. I said "Sorry, can't help you," and continued into the Union.

According to its Web site at www.nlp.org, TM is "the single most effective technique available for gaining deep relaxation, eliminating stress, promoting health, increasing creativity and intelligence, and attaining inner happiness and fulfillment." The TM movement began in 1956 in India and was introduced to the western world by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi (who, according to the site, recently inaugurated the "Fourth Year of His Global Administration Through Natural Law").

The next time I saw the NLP guy in front of the Union, I had done a little homework.

"Did you ever look into the transcendental meditation connection?" I asked.

He said he had visited the NLP Web site, but didn't see anything about TM.

Joe FRANSON

I told him he must not have been looking in the right places, because references to TM are sprinkled throughout. For example, it's included in their platform as a solution to various social problems. "Well, I'm just a paid canvasser," he said. "Anyway, I think if they promote meditation, that's good."

This wasn't an unreasonable view. Many people report positive benefits from meditating. It might be acceptable for the government to promote meditation if the meditation were secular.

The problem is that TM is not secular. TM, despite claims to the contrary, is based on religion, and the NLP, like the Christian right, wants to create a government based purely on religious principles.

Wouldn't that be a blatant violation of church-state separation? I sure think so.

The NLP was founded in 1992 to "bring the light of science into politics," according to its U.S. Web site at www.natural-law.org. The party holds that "natural law" is the solution to problems. "Government can solve problems at their basis through scientifically proven programs to bring every citizen, and the entire nation, into accord with natural law," according to the site.

Just what is this natural law? The NLP defines it as "orderly principles... that govern the functioning of nature everywhere." By following natural law, "individuals and nations can govern themselves with the same perfection in administration displayed throughout nature," the NLP Web site reads.

If this concept seems a little hazy to you, don't worry. The NLP says this is normal.

"The laws of nature are too vast and complex to be fully comprehended intellectually," the site says. "To bring the life of individuals into accord with natural law, education must provide a technique to give them direct access to the holistic value of natural law in pure consciousness."

And what technique might this be? Why, transcendental meditation, of course.

The NLP says TM is not a religious technique but a natural one. This is questionable in light of claims that TM can give the practitioner supernatural powers such as levitation (a video of which reveals people bouncing cross-legged on a mat) and invisibility.

The NLP also claims that large masses of people practicing TM simultaneously can affect all aspects of society for the better. One TM study claimed that mass TM reduced crime and accidents and increased crop yields in a localized area.

Also, the mantras people recite during TM are the names of Hindu gods — another clue that this is a religion, not a secular meditation technique.

That hasn't stopped the NLP, which has established itself in 80 countries. Its U.S. Web site says it is America's fastest-growing political party. Just last week, its U.S. presidential candidate, John Hagelin, finished first in the Reform Party Iowa/Minnesota straw poll, receiving 63 percent of the vote and upsetting party favorites Pat Buchanan, Donald Trump and Bob Bowman.

As with the religious right, a minority of voters were able to skew a vote by turning out in large numbers.

Though I sympathize with some of its progressive platform positions, the more I read about transcendental meditation and the Natural Law Party, the creepier it gets. TM might help one reduce stress, gain confidence, etc., but that doesn't mean it should have its own party bent on controlling the world.

Sure, the NLP is way too kooky to ever achieve that (especially if it doesn't start concealing its true intentions), but it's gaining some ground. Even if it never attains the power of the religious right, it's still frightening to see its views gaining acceptance as both good science and good public policy.

There is a wealth of information about TM and the NLP, both pro and con, on the Internet. Before signing any petition to get the NLP on the ballot, educate yourself about the party and its platform. As you do so, remember the principles of religious freedom this country was founded on.

New golden dollar in circulation reflects change in common perception of America

Did you collect anything when you were growing up? Rocks? Stamps? Rejection slips? Porcelain unicorns? Thimbles? Salt and pepper shakers?

I don't remember actively collecting them, but I do remember this beer stein on the buffet table filled with coins from every edge of the map.

All the European countries, plenty of Asian countries, even that wilderness to the north the enlightened ones whisper of as "Can-eh-dah." I loved looking at the elegance and diversity of their designs, and next to theirs, the change in my pocket just seemed, well, mundane.

Even worse than mundane. During my eye blink of a childhood, I remember only two changes in the United States' coinage: the unveiling of the bicentennial quarter (yes, I am that old) and the Susan B. Anthony dollar. In an age that brought us New Coke and the USFL, the Susan B. was an attempt to add some weight to pocket change: a dollar that jingles. Too bad it looked like a quarter — a lot like a quarter, to the point where people are still confusing them, like the last time I bought gas. Slap three coins on the counter and get a glare like you just showed the guy the blackmail photos of his little sister.

Other than those two deviations, though, coins were the same, painfully, depressingly familiar for far too long. I'm all for remembering the past, but the coins are so heavily iconic as to be inescapable, joyless, utterly uninteresting anymore.

Well, to hell with that, said the U.S. Mint.

You have to have noticed the new state quarter designs: each state is submitting a design for its individual quarter face, and they go into circulation five per year in the order of their admission into the Union, hence Kansas's quarter is still a few years down the road. Still, we've gotten treated to New Jersey's rendering of Washington crossing the Delaware, Delaware's "guy on a horse who isn't Paul Revere," and Georgia's "turn it upside down and it looks like a butt" peach.

I can't wait to see what Kansas comes up with. If it involves a Judy Garland movie, this is the end of our civilization. The new quarters were shiny, interesting, and kept my attention for a few minutes. Still, the most response they ever got out of me (except for the butt-peach) was an occasionally impressed "huh."

Enter the golden dollar.

On Jan. 30, this coin hit circulation first exclusively through Wal-Marts (does this worry anyone else?) and finally began trickling down (or at least out) to the rest of society proper. This is what coins are supposed to be. Forget the lame copper penny, the whisper-thin dime or the dressed-up-like-a-quarter Susan B.

The golden dollar feels like a dollar should. It's huge, it's easily discernible from the rest of your change and it just looks cool. Do yourself a favor and go get some of these dollars. You'll be paying face value for 'em, so it's not like an investment. But pay for something with them, even a handful of them.

You'll feel like an ancient trader giving gold for oxen, or maybe a pirate handing over doubloons (but just don't go "Arrrr!" to convenience store clerks too much; I think I've already weirded them out enough this week).

Don't think about the fact that the coin is not really gold at all — it's actually mostly copper, but it sure shines more than the newest penny. (And the new Pepsi machines on campus recognize it, which is a good thing, since the damn bottles cost a whole buck, mutter mutter grumble. ...)

You know what I like most about the new dollar? It ties into the fact that Sacagawea's smile emblazons the face of the coin, in a way. We've got lots of new variations on the quarter in circulation.

We've got the recent reintroduction of the Susan B.'s a few years back. Now it's the golden dollar. Grabbing a random handful of change isn't the same exercise it was a few decades ago.

Now the handful finds some new faces in the mix, some untraditional elements in this collection that is, by definition, America.

It's taken us a long, painful time to reacquire ourselves with the idea of America not as a specific, individual person or incarnation, but as a collection, as a union of once-dispossessed and rejected souls, people with no other tie, not political or religious or ethnic, save this land we now call home.

This is by no means a weakness; our inherent strength flows from our diversity — it is the differences that make us strong.

Our survival as a nation is incumbent upon accepting this fact, acknowledging it and championing it against the architects of oppression and intolerance, whether they preen themselves proudly in Vienna or lurk quietly in the bowels of Washington, D.C. America cannot afford to subscribe to the bliss or pretense of an "Ozzie and Harriet" homogeneity anymore.

We must grow beyond it. And all it needs to start is just a handful of change.

No, it's not the worst pun of my life, but... well, it's in the top five.

Speaker Barney Frank fails to address issues

Editor,

I had the opportunity to attend the much publicized talk given by Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass. This was the second American politician I have heard since coming to the United States.

The first was Bob Dole. I realized that, despite their different political leanings on the Democratic-Republican scale, the two did nothing but rave about a pompous image of America and its global role. Frank perhaps never answered a single question properly. He did not show the respect one would show to someone who is asking him to clarify an issue.

The best part — he got away with it.

This was new to me. You don't get to see politicians getting away so easily at a university in India, where I come from. I then realized this is America and anything can happen here. Anyway, I was frustrated at the end of the lecture because I felt my question addressing an important issue was breezed through and eventually lost amid the laughing audience.

Frank spoke of global warming and the Kyoto conference. His talk was filled with examples of 9-year-olds working in Thailand, India ... more so when he talked about global warming and environmental laws. In his lecture he criticized those Americans who were against curbing global warming.

He called them hypocritical. Any fool would have known he was attacking people beyond America because his examples mostly were targeting the Third World, not realizing all the commodities produced by these 9-year-olds are marketed to the United States.

As I mentioned earlier, it must have been very obvious to people in the audience who were acquainted with global politics and the global-warming agenda that Frank's criticism of hypocrisy went beyond America.

He was attacking the less-developed world, also — though not explicitly. I had a question regarding this attack — an attack Frank probably did not make openly for the sake of being politically correct, but an attack that was underlying his entire talk.

It seemed too simplistic to me that one would label these concerns as hypocritical. Why has global warming become an issue now, when America finally has finished its ruthless pursuit of wealth through industries?

If one asks these questions, one is not a hypocrite. It is too simplistic an argument to present. This also does not mean that one is unaware of child labor issues.

These are too very complex issues and trying to give a rhetorical argument to an audience might sell but will not enhance our understanding of global politics. More importantly, the role of America in globalization? Or is it Americanization?

Frank eventually emerged as a hero and said maybe they are not hypocritical but wrong.

My point is: Who in the hell is Frank to say that?

Given a few more minutes, I guess everyone who had questions would have made their points clearer to this arrogant, pompous, condescending and self-righteous man.

Columnist's abortion idea unacceptable, illogical

Editor,

One of the scariest trends in society today is the belief that it is acceptable to abandon logic and moral value in lieu of sensitivity. This scary trend was explicitly shown in Katie Sutton's viewpoint printed in Monday's Collegian.

Freedom has been a central value to the United States since its foundation. Where many are at fault is in forgetting that this value only is extended to situations where the choices do not harm others. For example, the right to choose to murder someone would not be one of those choices. The debate concerning abortion should be centered on the question of whether abortion is the taking of a human life. There is no justification for abortion if unborn babies are human, and there is no need for justification if they are not.

Many pro-choice advocates argue within some type of value calculus that simply does not add up. Some say rape or malformed babies justify abortion. This makes no sense. If it is a human life, then you have no more right to terminate it at one month than at one year. Some say it is better to allow abortion than to allow an unwanted baby. If an unborn child is a human life, you have no more justification to end it in the womb than you would in a home.

Some argue that if abortion were to be outlawed, women would be forced into dangerous, illegal abortions. I am not denying this is a completely tragic circumstance, but it no more justifies the taking of a human life inside of those women than any other human life.

Katie raises a very provocative question for those who believe unborn babies are a human life. She poses the problem of a pregnancy that threatens the mother's life.

Aren't parents justified in aborting a baby to save the mother's life? In this situation, there is justification for abortion. However, that does not justify abortion in any other situation. Losing a life in a medical operation to save lives does not justify abortion-on-demand.

I ask readers to consider Katie's ideas about our rights. If an overburdened parent of a 3-year-old child decides that he or she no longer can accept the inconvenience that the child poses, can that parent end the existence of that child's life?

Why aren't parents of born children given the right to make this choice? Should we be respectful of the conclusions they draw?

information systems

Society doesn't dictate killing of unborn child

Editor,

Having read Katie Sutton's column on abortion Monday, I must point out one thing that seems painfully obvious to me that apparently is not obvious to those who think abortion is a personal decision.

Sutton wrote "Abortion isn't right for everyone. Neither is early or unhealthy motherhood. There are many issues I didn't touch on, but the bottom line is, no one thinks alike. We can't push beliefs on people who don't agree." It is that last sentence that is most interesting. Sutton, do you really believe that? Does anyone who reads this paper believe society cannot force people to comply with a certain standard of morality? If readers would stop and think, I think most would realize that not only does every society force its members to accept certain standards — every society must do so.

An example should illustrate the point. Mr. X comes from a culture in which women are married at a very young age. Mr. X, now living in America, desires to marry an 11-year-old girl. If he tries to do this, he might be jailed, because in America, 11-year-olds are viewed as children who are not emotionally or physically ready for marriage. Haven't we pushed our beliefs on Mr. X? Yes, we have. But we have a legitimate right and a need to do so, if our beliefs are soundly based.

The real question in abortion boils down to: is a fetus a person? The nation has dodged this question. A fetus is not a person if a woman wants to abort it, but it is a person (in some states) if a pregnant woman is battered and suffers a miscarriage. On the whole, America has said it is up to the woman to decide whether a fetus is a person.

This is not the way the world — or morality — works. Calling a rock a loaf of bread does not make it edible. Calling the murder of civilians an act of war does not make it just. If a fetus is a person, then killing it is murder.

Right now, according to the Supreme Court, we do not know whether a fetus is a person. But if we are to be logical, the very fact that we do not know whether it is a person means we cannot abort it. As long as there is a significant possibility that lump of tissue constitutes a human life, we are morally bound to treat it as a life.

Before someone says I am imposing a foreign belief on others, think about this. If you come across a car accident, and find a victim whose heartbeat and breathing have stopped, you might begin performing CPR. Why?

Because there is a chance that person still is alive. And if you start performing CPR, you are obligated by law to continue doing so until you are exhausted, until someone else takes over, or until you have positive signs of death. As long as there is any chance of life, you must continue. This is because our society highly values human life.

This is because the other things we value all are dependent on life. If the government can take your life, all other freedoms are nothing but empty words. After all, a dead man cannot vote. If readers think about it, they will realize our current acceptance of abortion flies in the face of our attitudes about human life.

Pro-Lifers are not the ones trying to impose a foreign belief system on others. Rather, it is the pro-choice movement, which, by declaring one human being has the right to determine the value of another, has imposed its beliefs on the American people.

Farewell

Sports staff says goodbye to football great, gives tribute to Chief's successful career

Kansas City lost one of its icons Tuesday in Derrick Thomas. Members of the Collegian sports staff have written a few thoughts on Thomas. Derrick, the Kansas State Collegian will miss you.

Thomas was the pinnacle of what an athlete should be, on and off the field. On the field, he was magical when he blitzed around the corner. Off the field, he was inspiring in his work with children and the Third and Long foundation.

He was the great one. It is weird, but I don't believe he is gone. He will always be in my heart. In my mind I always will be able to picture him blitzing around the sideline or that bright smile that lit up a room when he walked into it. Derrick, Kansas City will never forget you, and the world will not forget you.

Thank you for all that you did for Kansas City, and thanks for the inspiration you gave me growing up.

With the ongoing problems in today's sports world, the loss of Thomas, the football player and man, forever will remind us of what sports used to be.

Though Thomas' life was taken far too early, he will be remembered and missed, but the one thing that always will stay true is his greatness, something many desire and few really accomplish.

But in Thomas' case, he did reach greatness. His desire to better himself as a man and a football player, and change the way the game was played, made him special.

One hopes the tragedy opens the eyes of other athletes around the country and maybe they begin to follow in Thomas' footsteps and start behaving like the heroes we once had like the one we lost Tuesday.

Thomas has been a part of my Sunday routine ever since I was a child.

Even when the Chiefs were terrible, I tuned in to find out how many sacks he would get. Thomas' seven-sack performance against Seattle was a Herculean task in my young mind.

When Thomas first joined the Chiefs, my conversations with my younger brothers often paralleled the Saturday Night Live skit with "Da Bears" fans. The Chicago fans would create match-ups like "Mini-Bears vs. God" to make a close game. My brothers and I often debated the possible outcome of a "Thomas vs. Refrigerator Perry" or "Thomas vs. Batman" matchup. The type of debate that never had a definite answer.

No fan of sports can go untouched by the loss of Thomas.

But since Thomas' loss, many critics have lamented that his death shows the triviality of sports and puts football into perspective as a small piece in the puzzle of life. To believe that would be to overlook the role that Thomas played in the lives of his teammates and fans.

Thomas lived, and ultimately died, as a football player. It was the forum of football that allowed us to know and come to love Thomas. It was through football that No. 58 was able to reach out to the community through his Third and Long charity and other service-oriented groups.

As we mourn for Derrick's loss, we must be conscious not to forget his triumphs on the field and off.

That would be the truest tragedy of all.

Speed. As much as anything, it is what defined Thomas.

On the field, he was one of the swiftest, most fearsome defenders in the National Football League. Off the field, the big-hearted star enjoyed an enormous circle of friends and a life in the fast lane.

He was quick with a quip or grin and quick to help those in need through his many charitable involvements.

Now, just as quickly, he is gone. I grew up watching Thomas. I wore a replica of his No. 58 jersey to Arrowhead Stadium many times. I cheered myself hoarse during the games he dominated.

I rooted for him most of all in this last game he had only begun. I had looked forward to seeing the indomitable spirit that had fueled his Hall of Fame career one day raise him out of his wheelchair and back to his feet. Now that day will never come.

To me, Thomas represented what the NFL is about at its best—love of the game, love of one's teammates and love of one's fans and community.

Sooners stomp Cats

Zoning defense stops K-State, directs OU to sluggish victory

By OWEN CANFIELD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NORMAN, Okla. — A small adjustment made a big difference for No. 16 Oklahoma on Tuesday night, stretching K-State's losing streak to nine games.

The Sooners began using zone defenses shortly after K-State pulled within three points in the second half. The switch stopped the Wildcats, and Oklahoma went on to a sluggish 85-64 victory.

K-State coach Tom Asbury said he had hoped the Sooners (19-3, 7-2 Big 12) would play zone.

But instead of attacking it, his players became impatient, and the result was a 23-6 run that ended any doubt about the outcome.

"When they switched to zone, we showed no patience, no execution. I bet we didn't run off 12 or 15 seconds," Asbury said.

The Wildcats trailed by as many as 11 points in the first half, after a 14-2 run by Oklahoma, but they cut the lead to 43-40 on a 3-pointer by Galen Morrison with 16:40 left in the game.

Oklahoma scored eight straight points, including one of Raymond's five three-pointers, to again push the lead to 11 before Kelvin Howell made consecutive baskets to get the Wildcats within 51-44 at the 13:40 mark.

But K-State made only one field goal in the next eight minutes.

Najera had a steal and assisted on a three-pointer by Tim Heskett to start the big run. During that stretch, the Wildcats only had two second-shot chances.

"We could have had those same shots after 20 or 25 seconds, with offensive rebounders," Asbury said.

"We panicked. We just flat-out panicked."

Howell had 12 points and 11 rebounds for K-State (8-13, 1-9), which has lost 10 of 11.

Oklahoma's Nolan Johnson goes up for a layup over K-State's Tony Kitt and Kelvin Howell in the first half of their game in Norman, Okla., Tuesday night. The Sooners defeated the Wildcats 85-64, extending K-State's losing streak to nine games.

RICHARD SMITH

Wildcats retain showdown hope

When the Grim Reaper that is K-State's Sunflower Showdown with KU comes to call, it's usually difficult to find positive things to talk about in the matchup.

At a glance, this game should be no different, with the 8-13 Wildcats coming in on a nine-game losing streak. But at least for once, the struggling Wildcats will be dealing with a Jayhawk team that has shown glimpses of being human, and for some reason that gives me a glimmer of hope for Saturday's game.

We all know the old saying that misery loves company. I had never thought that was true until recently. I'm heartened every day by the recent struggles of our hated, basketball-proficient rivals to the east. Now don't misunderstand me to say KU's recent struggles lower them to anywhere near K-State's current level. That would be just stupid to believe.

Roy Williams and Co. own a winning streak over the Wildcats that dates back quite awhile (the Carter administration, perhaps?) and probably will be at least 20-point favorites for the rematch coming up in Bramlage Coliseum this weekend.

But now that K-State's men's basketball losing streak has stretched longer than "The Green Mile," (the movie or the measurement, either one) it makes me giddy to see that, for at least one season, the Jayhawks also are fallible on the hardwood. That was never more clear than Monday night, when Oklahoma State dismantled KU 86-53.

The loss was KU's worst under Williams and puts an exclamation point on a troubling stretch for the team. Once conference favorites, the Hawks now have won only two of their past six contests, basically slipping out of contention for the regular-season conference title.

Cats to face 1-player team in matchup vs. Cowgirls

Deb Patterson gives instructions to April Sailors and Kim Woodlee during the closing minutes of the second half of a game earlier in the season.

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team has a simple assignment this week: stop Oklahoma State's shooting sensation Jennifer Crow, and the Cowgirls will be stopped, too.

When the Cats (9-13, 2-7) head to Stillwater for tonight's tip-off at 7 against the Cowgirls (12-9, 4-5), they will face what essentially is a one-player team. Last Sunday in a 75-58 loss against the University of Kansas, Crow, a senior guard averaging 21 points per game, scored 30 points. Two games earlier, Crow scored 34 in a game against Colorado.

The Cats, who have struggled to stop high-scoring guards in their past several games, will have their work cut out for them.

"She's really good," junior guard Kim Woodlee said. "She's more of a penetrator, and does a lot of leaning, and draws a lot of fouls."

The challenge for K-State's guards, who are not as quick as Crow, will be to keep the penetrating guard in front of them.

"We mainly try to keep her in front," Woodlee said. "She's more prone to penetrate than shoot the three, although she will shoot the three, if you give her enough time.

"She misses a lot of guarded shots, so if we can contest the shots and keep her in front and don't let her get to the line, we'll be okay," Woodlee said.

Besides Crow, only one other OSU player scores in double figures.

When the Cats have the ball, they will try to pound it into their own scoring stars. Last Saturday against Missouri, senior center Olga Firsova scored 18 points, and senior forward Nicky Ramage added 15.

Despite those performances, however, the Cats still lost their fifth game in a row. As a result, Ramage said the team is in desperate need of a victory.

"Win, that's a big key right now," Ramage said. "I think if we just play like we did last game, except finish it, I think we'll definitely get a win."

The problem for K-State throughout the losing streak has been putting together 40 minutes of good basketball. Ramage said the Cats' game against Missouri was close to 40 minutes of good play.

"We showed Saturday that we could play 40 minutes hard, especially the last four minutes when we were behind by 11 and we came back to within three," Ramage said. "I think if we go out and play 40 minutes hard, we'll get a win."

Inside play, 3-point shooting mark keys to deciphering women's season

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The 1999-2000 season for the K-State women's basketball team has been a mixed bag.

On one hand, the Cats' (9-13, 2-7) inside play has been as solid as advertised in the preseason. Seniors Nicky Ramage, Angie Finkes and Olga Firsova have combined for 37 points per game, and Ramage and Finkes are in the top 10 in scoring in the conference.

On the flip side, however, the season literally has been a hit-and-miss affair for the team's perimeter players. Junior Kim Woodlee and sophomore Kristin Rethman have shown flashes of brilliance from behind the three-point arc. Both are among the top three-point shooters in the nation, but they both also have struggled at times to find the mark.

Now that the Cats are one game into the second half of conference play, it is time to review their performance so far.

The Cats on offense

"You have to be explosive on the offensive end of the floor," head coach Deb Patterson said. "You have to catch in rhythm, you have to take a shot with an aggressive mind-set, and I think when Kristin and Kim play the game at that level, they're very good."

Rethman and Woodlee have been deadly at times, so much so that opposing coaches are focusing their game plan around these two sharpshooters. However, effective ball handling also is required to run an offense, and the Cats have struggled with the ball at times, turning the ball over nearly 20 times a game.

Junior transfer point guard April Sailors has had, at times, difficulty handling the full-court press, a difficulty caused by all the guards, Woodlee said.

"I think we put too much pressure on April, because Kristin and I can bring the ball up the court," Woodlee said. "I think if Kristin and I would do that, it would help out a lot."

Inside the paint, however, the Cats have maintained an advantage over opponents in most all games they have played.

"Our go-to players are in the paint," Woodlee said. "Our post players are our leaders."

As well as the post players have performed, Ramage focuses more on what they can do to improve.

"I just think, like it is with everybody on the team, not just the posts, the guards, need to be intense for 40 minutes," Ramage said.

"And to have discipline enough, even when you're tired, to still play hard to go after loose balls and not to make stupid fouls."

The Cats on defense

"We've been a very good defensive ball club this year," Patterson said.

The Cats have been holding opponents to 63 points and a 40 percent shooting percentage. However, in the last two games, Nebraska and Missouri were able to shoot at least 50 percent and make baskets during crunch time, a prime concern for the Cats.

The solution to this problem, for Ramage and Woodlee, is the same the solution to the team's five-game losing streak: play with intensity for 40 minutes.

The Cats as a team

Despite K-State's current five-game losing streak, Patterson remains optimistic about the Cats' future, if they take the next step.

"I do think our players have improved individually, but for us the next stage of improving is winning the close games," Patterson said.

Surprisingly, the Cats are 2-5 in games decided by five points or less, games which K-State traditionally has dominated, Patterson said.

"I can't say that I expected that this team would have difficulty with winning close games because that's never been something we've struggled with," Patterson said.

"When I evaluate tape after the fact, it's never a surprise why. It's very easy to identify why and how it happened," Patterson said.

"It's mentally and physically time for us to take that next step."

“I think if we go out and play 40 minutes hard, we’ll get a win.”

Distance education helps future teachers achieve goals, gives local Head Start boost

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mary DeLuccie, associate professor and coordinator of the early childhood education program at K-State, said instructors and teachers who obtain upper education are improving for children.

A recent mandate by Head Start is requiring that 50 percent of its instructors have a degree. The K-State distance education program will help teachers in the state, as well as other teachers from accredited school districts, obtain the courses needed to accomplish this goal.

The program, created in 1987, allows teachers to have access to college courses so they can get a degree in early childhood education and teaching certificates. The program originally was funded for three years by a $238,000 grant from the U.S. Department of Education and recently has been expanded to include other teachers in the state.

DeLuccie said an estimated 30 teachers in Kansas have taken classes through the distance learning program.

"This program was designed to provide early childhood education course work over audio, visual teleconferencing to Head Start teachers across Kansas," DeLuccie said. "It enables them to finish their undergraduate degree and obtain a teaching certificate in early childhood education without leaving their jobs."

The program allows students to take 72 hours of general education and professional teacher education course work through distance education. The remaining hours can be transferred from community colleges or other four-year institutions upon approval from K-State to meet graduation requirements.

Janice Nikkel, program coordinator with the Division of Continuing Education, said the program benefits children because they are getting education from instructors who are becoming better trained in early childhood education. She said most of the teachers now might not have any college courses or only associate degrees, so they now will have access to courses that will give them certification and college degrees.

"The program is providing instructors and teachers with the most up-to-date course work in the field," Nikkel said. It is benefiting the teachers because they are becoming professionally trained in the core area of early childhood education."

Sally Frick is the director of the Head Start in Manhattan, a child development organization that serves children from birth to age 5 and is designed to further the healthy development of low-income children and focuses on increasing the school readiness of young children. Frick said she thinks it is tough for Head Start programs in the United States to get their instructors a degree without having them quit their jobs. She said in the Manhattan Head Start, all teachers have a degree, and a couple of them obtained their degrees through K-State's distance program.

"This allows them to continue to work and still meet their professional goals," Frick said. "For anybody, the more education they have, the more they can draw from their knowledge and the stronger person they become for the children. Nobody should ever stop learning."

Frick said the two instructors who participated in the distance education program already were enrolled in night classes at the university, but because of the program, they were able to finish in a more quickly.

"This program is designed to support teachers in the unique environment of Head Start," Frick said. "Many people feel that all they need is to be able to enjoy children."

"However, when people get all the education they can and are challenged to read, learn and work with other professionals, they can appropriately meet the needs of the children and their families."

DeLuccie said it is important for teachers to get the qualifications in early childhood education because the experiences children have in programs such as Head Start are linked to the experiences they have with their teachers.

"The more understanding teachers have about the development of children and how they think better provides experiences that are better for the children," DeLuccie said.

"Too much of a good thing is wonderful."

Snyder honored for service

By TERENCE LEWIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State head football coach Bill Snyder was honored Tuesday evening by the Manhattan Kiwanis Club for his exceptional service with the youth and the Manhattan community.

The Kiwanis presented Snyder with the Tablet of Honor. The award, the highest given out by Kiwanis International, recognizes outstanding service by groups or individuals. Snyder accepted the award in the Ramada Inn Plaza Hotel Ballroom.

David Royse, president of the Manhattan Kiwanis Club, said Snyder always has helped out worthy organizations, from autographing footballs to donating money and time when needed in the community.

He said Snyder deserves the award for all that he has done.

"I think he has done a lot of good things in the community," said Will Bernhardt, vice president of the Manhattan chapter. "He probably doesn't want to be recognized for all that he has done... people in the community know it, though."

Snyder also received an honorary membership in the Manhattan Kiwanis Club from the organization.

A host of Kiwanis Club members from across the state of Kansas were on hand to see Snyder receive the award.

"He was definitely a good choice," said Dee Gieswein, member of the Flint Hills Kiwanis club. "That is an award only given to distinguished people, and I feel he was very honorable for that."

When brought up to accept the award, Snyder praised the organization as well as a youth chapter of Circle K whose members were present for their work in the community.

"It's really special to see people your age begin to understand the idea of giving and compassion," Snyder said. "We need in our society people that are compassionate, people who care."

4 people escape from hijacked Afghan plane at British airport

By CAROLINE BYRNE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

STANSTED, England — Four men dropped from the cockpit window of a hijacked plane and ran to safety Tuesday night, fleeing the Afghan aircraft that has been parked for two days at a British airport while negotiators sought the safe release of more than 150 passengers.

In the darkness shortly before midnight, the men fell about 20 feet to the ground and ran toward positions manned by police.

"They are four men and they are now with us," police spokeswoman Kim White said.

It was not immediately clear if the four were hostages or hijackers. Police said they were trying to gauge what effect the escape was having on the people aboard the plane. It appeared all was calm on the aircraft, they said.

Earlier, negotiators warned that the talks, which gained the release of a ninth hostage during the day Tuesday, could go on for days.

"The negotiations are going forward in a professional way, in a fairly calm way," said John Broughton, an Essex Police assistant chief constable. "The principal concern here is the safety of the passengers on board that aircraft."

The aims of the hijackers, believed to be Afghans, remained unclear. Speculation ranged from an elaborate play for political asylum to a bid to win the release of Ismail Khan, a former regional governor in Afghanistan detained since 1997 by the country's ruling Taliban movement.

Asked about a potential asylum bid, Broughton said, "In talking around the issues, there are a lot of things raised." He would not elaborate, saying only that the hijackers, who controlled the plane at Stansted Airport 25 miles north of London, had made no formal demands.

Most of the negotiations involved what Broughton called housekeeping issues, such as the delivery of water and food to the Ariana airlines plane.

"We've done everything we can to keep the conditions on the aircraft habitable," said Joe Edwards, another Essex Police assistant chief constable. "We're talking all the time about what's the condition of people and how are the children."

A London representative of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees arrived at Stansted as an observer, police said Tuesday evening. She would not be a negotiator, but would bring to the crisis the strength of the U.N.'s expertise on the situation in Afghanistan, Edwards said.

The Boeing 727 had been headed to the northern Afghan city of Mazar-e-Sharif from the Afghan capital, Kabul, when it was seized early Sunday. It then began a meandering journey across the former Soviet Union, stopping in Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan and Russia.

According to some of the 22 passengers released before the plane landed at Stansted early Monday, the hijackers are eight young men armed with pistols, grenades and daggers. Edwards said former hostages that authorities have talked to have said there were between six and 10 hijackers.

They were believed still to be holding more than 150 hostages, including 21 children. All the passengers were believed to be Afghans.

Eight passengers were released at Stansted on Monday, including two infants who were treated for dehydration. The man released earlier Tuesday, an asthmatic, had complained of feeling ill, Broughton said.

The freed hostages have said they were treated well, authorities said. One told reporters the hijacking started somewhat quietly 20 minutes into the flight, with the armed men calmly telling passengers to put their hands on their heads.

"The people we are talking to are remarkably calm and that's really important," Edwards said. "The atmosphere is one of control, people behaving rationally. That's going to help an awful lot."

All six Iraqi men at the center of Britain's last hijacking drama — a 1996 case involving a Sudanese airliner — remain in the country as asylum-seekers, the British government confirmed Tuesday. Those men held 197 people hostage for seven hours at Stansted.

They were convicted in 1997 and sentenced to between five and nine years in prison. But they were cleared on appeal a year later after a court ruled the trial judge was wrong to bar jurors from considering their defense — that they were acting under necessity as opponents of Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's regime.

The men had claimed they stormed the plane in a desperate bid to enter Britain and seek asylum.

Afghanistan is one of the top sources of asylum seekers in Britain. An average of 360 applications a month has been lodged by Afghans since October. Refugee status is granted in about a third of cases.

Houses of the future to be 'smarter'

By LINDA BYRD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

By the time many K-State students graduate and pay their student loans, they should be able to use their earnings to invest in what researchers call a "smart" house.

Marilyn Bode, K-State's Division of Cooperative Extension, said a smart house is one controlled by a central computer system. The system links the operation of all lights, systems and appliances together for the convenience of the homeowner. It can let a homeowner know if an appliance needs to be turned off or what temperature it is anywhere in the house.

For those who tend to forget their ovens when cooking, this system could tell ovens to make the television flash when a baked item is done. Phone, stereo and TV speakers would work from any socket in the house.

"Smart House technology allows linkage from your security system to your television. A camera outside shows the view of the person at your door onto your television and then you can speak to them through remote device," Bode said.

Remote devices will be used from automobiles to signal the home's whirlpool tub to fill with water, heat and start its bubbles. Other luxury items will include 3D television (no eyewear necessary), heated carpeting, moving kitchens designed with electronically adjustable counter heights, and lawnmowers able to sense when the grass needs mowing and do the job for you.

Tiffany Minor, junior in public relations, said she isn't certain she would want a smart house.

"Technology is great, but what if something breaks? Would I come home to find my programmable tub has flooded my new house?" she said.

The not-so-smart part of future homes will be that the technology and products will be available to consumers, but middle-income consumers cannot afford highly skilled, highly priced technicians for repairs.

Bode said this poses a problem, but with use, refined technology and expanded markets, items that were once expensive and difficult to repair will become cheaper and routine to repair.

The Smart House will be part of the green building phenomenon. It will make the best use of natural resources instead of wasting them.

Bode said the goal is to use natural resources instead of manufactured resources in building quality homes.

Newer homes are built with natural resource and energy conservation in mind. One Manhattan house built about five years ago has geothermal heating, which uses heat from the ground to warm the air inside. Other houses outside of Manhattan are constructed partially with straw bales covered in stucco, which provides insulation.

Carpet made from recycled plastic soda bottles is being installed in homes now. Photovoltaic roofs convert sunlight directly into storable electricity.

According to a research information booklet from the University of Nebraska, microwave clothes dryers are being tested in laboratories and are expected to kill bacteria and reduce drying time 30 percent. This means a small load of laundry would take only five minutes to dry.

Wholesalers file new lawsuit against tobacco industry

By LAURIE ASSEO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A federal lawsuit targeted the tobacco industry anew Tuesday, accusing it of carrying out a systematic plan to fix cigarette prices charged to wholesalers.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court, asserts that the main U.S. cigarette manufacturers met secretly to make illegal agreements on wholesale prices.

Filed by two cigarette wholesalers, in Buffalo, N.Y., and Bryan, Texas, the lawsuit seeks triple damages and class-action status to represent all wholesalers hurt by the alleged price fixing.

The tobacco industry has been under mounting pressure for selling a product the American Cancer Society calls the leading cause of cancer.

All 50 states reached settlements in which tobacco companies will pay them $246 billion for the cost of treating smoking-related illnesses.

The Justice Department also sued the industry last September, seeking billions of additional dollars to repay federal health-insurance costs. A Florida jury ruled in a class-action lawsuit last July that the cigarette makers produced a defective and deadly product. That jury now is considering damages that industry lawyers say could exceed $300 billion.

The lawsuit filed Tuesday alleges the tobacco companies fixed prices during meetings of cigarette company lawyers who frequently discussed, and reached agreements regarding, future price increases for cigarettes.

Daniel W. Donahue, deputy general counsel for R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., one of the defendants, said the lawsuit is without any basis in fact or law, and that the company intends to defend the case.

Donahue said the issues of price increases and competitive practices were avoided at the meetings of industry lawyers.

Michael York, an attorney for Philip Morris, said the lawsuit was so meritless it can be considered nothing more than a maneuver by lawyers to collect more fees.

Those named as defendants include Philip Morris Cos.; R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Holdings, Inc.; Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., a unit of British American Tobacco Co., Ltd.; Lorillard Tobacco Co., a unit of Loews Corp.; and Liggett Group, a unit of Brooke Group Ltd.

The lawsuit said there was virtually no cigarette price competition from the 1950s until 1980, when Liggett introduced low-price generic discount cigarettes.

Other companies introduced generic brands, and after a 1993 price war, a price increase announced by Philip Morris signaled to the other companies the company would resume the agreement not to compete in the U.S. cigarette market on the basis of price, the lawsuit said.

On numerous occasions in the following years, cigarette companies quickly matched each other's price increases, the lawsuit said. Wholesalers often received notification of price increases from the tobacco companies within hours or even within minutes of each other, it said.

Exotic surroundings

STORIES & PHOTOS BY REED DUNN

Nickerson bed and breakfast has backyard full of unusual surprises, rooms for safari

A yellow cat crawled onto the porch and curled up in the midafternoon sun. A tan dog followed and snuggled up next to the cat.

It might sound like an everyday occurrence on many American front porches. At Hedrick's Exotic Animal Farm and Country Inn, the cat and dog are the exotic animals.

Kangaroos, camels, zebras, giraffes and ostriches are a few of the animals running loose in the backyard of the bed-and-breakfast inn. Some of the more exotic animals on the farm are reindeer, Vietnam deer, emus and capybaras, the world's largest rodent.

Joe Hedrick, owner of the establishment, said he has been an animal lover for as long as he can remember. Hedrick said his family had a pet badger, coyote and a number of other pets.

"It goes back to when I was a little kid and my dad was on the rodeo circuit," he said. "I grew up around my dad's trick mule and horses."

Marcie Cambell, zookeeper, said the animals on the farm today are bred on location to maintain good health and good disposition. She said this is important for visitors, especially those who mistake the farm for a city zoo.

"Everybody who comes to the bed and breakfast gets to visit the animals," Cambell said. "It's not neat and clean like a zoo. This is a working farm."

There are caretakers and barn workers on-hand each day to tend to the chores and needs of the animals. Cambell said the staff members' daily routine creates a sense of attachment to the animals.

"Most of us have worked with animals our entire life," she said. "These are our kids. When a human being decides to have an animal, we have to assume full responsibility."

Animals that have been with the business for such a long time just become part of the mix, Cambell said. Suzie, an old trick mule for Hedrick's traveling shows, walks around the farm outside of any pen.

"When they're a member of the family, they're a member of the family forever," Cambell said. "We're kind of a laid-back outfit. This is Kansas, and we want people to feel real comfortable."

Suzie has been around since she worked as Hedrick's personal trick mule during Hedrick's college years. Hedrick said he joined the rodeo circuit while attending Fort Hays State and began purchasing more and more animals. After college, he taught school until the petting-zoo business became a full-time job.

"I taught school for nine years, and my wife taught school for nine years," Hedrick said. "It began to get so busy I quit teaching school and made it a full-time career. Now, it is more than that."

Hedrick said the bed and breakfast was built on the farm in 1992 and opened the next year. He said it was added after the number of visitors to the farm increased.

"People would come to the farm to visit, so I thought it would be nice if people could stay here," he said. "The show-business side of it is still the backbone."

The exterior of the bed and breakfast is meant to resemble a group of Old West building fronts. Business names were created from Hedrick's attorney, banker, insurance agent and dentist. All of the rooms at the bed and breakfast are decorated in a theme relevant to the farm.

"We thought it was only appropriate to go with animals from the farm," Hedrick said. "We started using our imagination to bring it together."

Two of the inn's seven rooms are family suites, offering accommodations for groups of four or more. The Zebra Family Suite has two queen-sized beds and a set of bunk beds. In the Ostrich Suite, a hot tub room is attached to the bedroom.

Other rooms at the inn offer a queen-sized bed, including the Petting Zoo Room. The Petting Zoo Room is the only room on the ground level of the bed and breakfast and is set up to be accessible to those with disabilities.

Loretta Bailey, innkeeper, said the establishment is different from others in that it is family-oriented.

"We're more homelike," she said. "Children are very welcome here. It's made for a family to be able to enjoy themselves."

Bailey said the inn has repeat visitors and is busiest during the Kansas State Fair and during sporting tournaments.

"I have families who send me pictures," she said. "It's really fun. You watch the kids grow up."

Along with the attractions at the farm near Nickerson, Kan., the Hedricks' business also includes educational petting zoos, pony and camel rides and pig, ostrich and camel races. Cambell said the attractions are oriented toward family entertainment.

"Every single thing we do is for the family," she said. "It's all family entertainment. We travel from coast to coast and border to border."

Some of the animals from Hedrick's even have become stars. Geoffrey, a giraffe, appeared in a bubble-gum commercial that ran in Holland. Cambell said the farm has been contacted to provide trained animals for a number of movies, including "Waiting to Exhale."

A large part of Cambell's job includes taking the animals on the road to different shows around the country. She said this is what makes the job enjoyable and that she gets to work alongside her husband.

"There's nothing better than taking an animal and having people enjoy them," she said.

"That's what it's all about. I get paid to do what other people pay to do on their vacations."

The room is equipped with two queen sized beds and a second room with bunk beds. Above: These two giraffes are part of the collection of exotic animals at Hedrick's Exotic Animal Farm and Country Inn near Nickerson, Kan. Center in midst of restoration Cosmosphere specialists restore Gus Grissom's Liberty Bell 7 capsule.

It sank 38 years ago.

In September, a restoration crew at the Kansas Cosmosphere and Space Center began restoring astronaut Gus Grissom's space capsule, Liberty Bell 7.

The mission was launched from Cape Canaveral on July 21, 1961. After a 15-minute flight, the hatch prematurely jettisoned, but exactly what happened remains a mystery.

Greg Buckingham, restoration specialist, said Liberty Bell 7 is one of many projects he has helped restore in his seven years at the Cosmosphere. He has worked on more than six other restoration projects, including Apollo 13.

"We've been working on the restoration for five months, and we have about three more weeks," Buckingham said. "It's a work in progress. I really enjoy putting these things together. It's just a lot of fun."

After the spacecraft was recovered, three feet of debris was siphoned through one inch at a time, Buckingham said. He said it is important to perform such tedious work in order to recover all of the capsule's remains.

"We've tried to reclaim as much of the spacecraft as we can," he said. "A vast majority of the aluminum corroded away. We will use plexiglass to show where that was."

Jessica Johnson, gift shop employee, said the project has drawn crowds of visitors to the museum.

"It's really busy because of the Liberty Bell exhibit," she said. "The exhibit will be leaving in March for three years, so I think everybody wants to come see it before it goes."

Karen Siebert, marketing director for the Cosmosphere, said the restoration project has increased the number of guests at the museum and the number of hits to the Cosmosphere Web site.

"Ever since we put the spacecraft on exhibit in September, we have had a definite increase in museum attendance," Siebert said. "We're definitely getting our name out there. We had 2 million hits from our Web site from all parts of the world."

The Cosmosphere has been working to recover the capsule for 20 years, Siebert said.

"Liberty Bell 7 was the most important American spacecraft that was yet to be recovered," she said. "And we recovered it."

After the three-year tour to cities around the United States, the spacecraft will return to become part of the Cosmosphere's permanent collection.

Buckingham said restoring the project as an exhibit at the museum is a helpful and educational process.

"It's much better for people to walk up and ask a question, 'Why did this ...?' or 'What about that?'" he said.

The Cosmosphere is open from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. Monday through Saturday and from noon to 9 p.m. on Sundays. Other attractions at the museum are the Carey IMAX Dome Theater, Justice Planetarium Theater, Dr. Goddard's Lab, Cargo Bay Gift Store and food court.

One of the exhibits at the Kansas Cosmosphere and Space Center depicts a scene from the first moon landing. Other exhibits at the center are a number of authentic space suits and a piece of moon rock retrieved from the mission.

Barbecue restaurant draws locals through hickory-smoked flavor

Rolls of paper towels have replaced the napkin holders. Wooden farm tools decorate the fire-engine red walls. Red-and-white-checked tablecloths give the restaurant at 2401 N. Main the look of a picnic.

Gary Poulton, owner of Hog Wild Pit Bar-B-Q, said the decorations set the restaurant apart from others of the same kind.

"A lot of barbecue places don't have a feel or motif to speak," Poulton said. "We wanted to offer a more true restaurant for our customers."

Hog Wild was opened about 1 1/2 years ago, serving a variety of smoked beef brisket, turkey, pork, chicken, ham, ribs and hot links.

Poulton also owns two submarine-sandwich shops in Hutchinson, Kan. He said that when he purchased them, the Hog Wild building came with the deal. The building, previously occupied by Spaghetti Jack's, was turned into Hog Wild in light of Poulton's love for barbecue.

"I thought the market was under-served," Poulton said. "I got that with the package and needed to do something with it. I have always been a barbecue fan and thought I could offer a restaurant with consistency."

All of the meats served at Hog Wild are slow-cooked in a smoker. Poulton said the business takes pride in the way it handles and cooks the meat.

"Our smoker runs 22 hours a day," Poulton said. "Beef and pork is smoked for 14 hours overnight. Our other meats are smoked two times each day, for lunch and dinner."

Beef brisket and pulled pork are the two most popular menu items, Poulton said. All of the meat products are smoked using only hickory wood. Poulton said this is one reason he thinks the restaurant is successful.

"The flavor you get from our place is something you can't get at home," he said. "We have had a lot of repeat business and referrals."

Josh Wissing, assistant manager of Hog Wild, said the repeat business is rooted in the service the employees provide.

"We're real appreciative to our customers," he said. "We talk to them, and I think that keeps them coming back in. We get to know the people's names."

Wissing said affordable prices keep the restaurant competitive. A dinner consisting of a choice of meat, Texas toast and two sides costs around $6.

"We've got a real competitive price, and we offer a lot more choices," he said. "Our style is just different from other restaurants."

Sucker

Colorado-based, high-energy band headlines at Rusty's tonight

By CHELSEA SCHMIDT

KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

It all started with a set of drums. "In college, I didn't really play at all, but then my girlfriend got me into hand-drumming," Scott Stoughton, lead singer of Sucker, said. "I got into the spiritual and natural part of music. There is incredible power in drums, and they just drew me in."

That's how the lead singer of Colorado-based hip-hop, funk and dub reggae band, Sucker, was drawn to music.

Choosing to follow one's dream is something essential, Stoughton said. Dennis Valencia, Sid Greenbud and Rodney Coquia complete the four-member group, which chose to follow its dream as the theme of the band's name.

"If you choose to follow your dream, you are going to have a tough time at it," Stoughton said. "I was in another band, and we moved to L.A. six years ago where we were doing really good. Then, two rich kids in the band quit 'cause L.A. was too hard. Me, I struggled to get by. At one point, we had five people living in one house. I was a sucker, because all I love to do is music."

Stoughton said he thought Sucker would be the perfect name because he said people tend to become suckers for what they want to do in life.

As Sucker travels to Nashville, it will be making a stop in Manhattan tonight for a 10:30 concert at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon. The concert has free admission.

Pete Anderson, Chance manager, said he received information secondhand that Sucker played at the Warehouse Opera House last year with Pomeroy, a Manhattan band.

"Our sound guy knew of them, because he thought about going on tour with them," Anderson said. "They are supposed to have a good following."

A high-energy concert is planned for those in attendance, Stoughton said.

"When we go places we haven't played before, people don't know what to expect," Stoughton said. "So we come out and play intense. We go out and give 150 percent right off the bat. Then, after four or five songs, we see how the crowd is."

Stoughton said, based on previous concerts across the country, the crowd usually likes the band's style of music.

"Ninety-nine-point-nine percent or even 100 percent of the time, people lock in and the concert goes off," he said. "Then, after a short break everyone is primed."

Rusty Wilson, Chance owner, said it is not uncommon to bring in bands of this caliber for concerts. He said Chance brings in bands once or twice a week, hoping to appeal to a diverse group of people.

"It varies," Wilson said. "We try to stay away from the weekends, because we should be busy anyway. If we have bands come, it will be on either Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday, one or two times a week."

Stoughton said although their music is intense and full of energy, it also relays positive influences to the crowd.

"It's super-high energy, but also has a positive Bob Marley kind of influence," he said. "Reggae is a really big part."

Although life as a musician can be challenging at times, Stoughton said he wouldn't give it up for anything.

"Music is something that gives off positive vibes and allows you to get down with people around you," Stoughton said. "That's so important, because life is too short."

Sucker has released one compact disc, "The Way," and the group is pre-producing its second.

"Our first CD was released last year, however, we only play six of the 11 songs any more," Stoughton said. "Now, our style has matured, and we figured out what we want to do."

Recording artists King Me will be performing at 9:30 p.m. Thursday at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon. The Wichita-based band will perform songs from their 1998 debut compact disc, "About Life."

King Me consists of four native Kansans: Luke Carter, Pete Dawson, Steve Green and Dan Weller.

The group's music is influenced by artists such as U2, Pink Floyd, the artist formerly known as Prince and The Doors.

Off-beat humor, farcical ideas characterize play

By CAIT PURINTON

KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Picasso will meet Einstein at Nichols Theatre for a bit of intellectual humor and bathroom humor as well.

"Picasso at the Lapin Agile" will open Thursday night. The show is one of K-State Theatre's scheduled performances for the spring semester.

"This play has a lot to say about the nature of genius and the nature of creation," director Charlotte MacFarland said. "It's a very intellectual play, but it has a lot of surreal comedy."

She said it has off-beat humor and farcical ideas, much like its writer, actor-comedian Steve Martin.

"What's important about this is the people are going to go, 'Picasso at the Lapin Agile?' But it's a Steve Martin play," MacFarland said. "Everybody knows Steve Martin is a little bizarre, and so is this play."

In her director's notes, MacFarland said Martin is a Renaissance man and has had lifelong interests in art, philosophy and science.

"As a matter of fact, he took courses in philosophy in college with the initial goal of becoming a philosophy teacher someday," MacFarland said. "He is a well-respected amateur art collector and science buff, but he has constantly been drawn to expose the complexity and ironies of life, and acting and writing have always seemed to be the best way to reflect upon those realities."

The play is set in the Lapin Agile, which is an actual bar in France. MacFarland said the bar was a popular hangout for writers, literary critics and famous artists, including Pablo Picasso, at the turn of the 19th century.

"In the KSU Theater production, we have chosen to depict the Lapin Agile as it actually was — a seedy, run-down room — rather than as a more elegant representation of a turn-of-the-century bar, as some productions do," MacFarland said. "The play, however, moves glibly back and forth in time."

This bohemian bar, as MacFarland describes it, is where Picasso, 23, and Albert Einstein, 25, meet before Picasso created his most famous paintings and Einstein published his theory of relativity.

"You have young men and women on the verge of making discoveries that would change the world," MacFarland said. "It's about that meeting, and Martin has fun with that."

Even though the play takes place in 1904, many aspects of it are modern.

One example of the play's modern touches is a surprise visitor from the future who doesn't appear until the end.

Some of the characters, in addition to Picasso and Einstein, are based on real people.

The bartender, Picasso's lovers and his art dealer are based on actual people. All other characters in the play are creations of Martin's imagination.

MacFarland said the play itself is based loosely on fact.

"Martin said: 'This is about a bar, and Picasso went there. That's the only part that's true, and the rest of it I made up,'" MacFarland said.

The play also has its own special touch of K-State.

A statue on the stage is not in script but was added by the cast and crew.

The statue is seen in one of Picasso's paintings that used to hang in the Lapin Agile but now is at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. Because the statue was not in the script, the cast added it to the play with a surprise twist.

What makes this play different from others is its fast pace, Ben Hensley, senior in theater, said. Hensley, who plays the playful, woman-chasing Picasso, said this is his fourth play at K-State.

"Half of a play won't function until the audience gets there. With this play, it's three-fourths," he said.

"So much is written to the audience,"

That so much of the play is written to the audience is ironic, because the audience already knows what happens, MacFarland said.

Brian Karlin, sophomore in business, plays Einstein.

He said the cast has made great strides in the time it has been given to learn the work.

"I think this is really a good play on top of the fact Steve Martin wrote it," Karlin said. "And that should be enough."

Does this mean the Jayhawks are a bad team? The answer is yes or no, depending on exactly how you define "team." If you mean "team" as in the aggregate skill level of the players who comprise the team, then the answer is no, it is not a bad team.

In fact, the phenomenal skill level of the team is what brought all of the preseason first-place predictions that they are failing to fulfill.

Williams goes at least 10 players deep off his bench not because he has to but because he can to take advantage of a roster that is a virtual who's-who of McDonald's All-Americans and preseason All-Big 12 selections.

That's also where part of the problem, and the "yes" of the earlier yes and no situation, originates. If you define "team" by the performance of the total unit, the Hawks seem somewhat lacking.

Although KU ranks No. 1 in the league in total scoring, the wholesale lineup switches seem to have stifled some of the continuity and chemistry of the offense.

During their recent slump, the Hawks' shooting percentage has fallen off a cliff.

But struggles or no, the Wildcats, KU's apparent next victim, appear in poor position to snap the lengthy Sunflower Showdown losing streak that will weigh on them as they take the court Saturday.

The Wildcats come into the game with problems in virtually every facet of the game, most notably turnovers and field-goal defense.

The lineup is thin and less talented than the Jayhawks', and their motivation must be waning as they continue to ride the business end of a mean losing streak.

It would be stupid to pick the Wildcats to win, wouldn't it?

Maybe so, but you can't be a Chiefs fan for as many years as I have without learning to hope for the hopeless, trust in the fallible and have your predictions made to look foolish on a routine basis. That's why I'm picking the Cats on Saturday.

All of KU's recent losses have come on the road, and the KU game guarantees that there will be at least a brief 15 minutes this season where Bramlage Mausoleum is filled with cheering fans. KU would seem to be ripe for overconfidence, taking on a team that they have a 12-game winning streak against.

On the flip side, the Wildcats have their backs about as squarely against the wall as they can be.

Their NCAA tourney hopes are gone. Their NIT hopes are even fading.

All they have left is pride and the chance to preserve one of the few meaningful records that has remained through these recent years — the program's NCAA-best 53 consecutive seasons with a winning record on their home court.

KU has a specific Achilles heel that plays into K-State's hands — they haven't shot or defended the three particularly well this season.

Wildcat guard and trey specialist Galen Morrison could exploit that weakness, as could streaky Cortez Groves, who is due for a hot game.

Is it stupid to say that the Wildcats will win 72-65? Probably, but what the heck — it doesn't matter anymore, anyway. If I'm right, I'm a genius, and if I'm not, no one will care on Monday, anyway.

It's not as though it will have ruined the entire season.

For at least one game in this embattled season, the Cats will have the support of their entire fan base behind them. It says here that they will make good on that.

announced by state Sen. Bill Kenney, a former Chiefs quarterback. "Derrick Thomas was a true hero," he said.

Thomas was at the wheel of a car during a snowstorm Jan. 23 as he and two friends headed to the Kansas City International airport to fly to St. Louis to watch the NFC Championship game. He lost control of the car and it overturned at least three times, police said.

Police said Thomas was speeding and weaving in traffic, but prosecutor Don Norris said there was not enough evidence to file charges.

by football fans around the nation, but we will miss him in Kansas City for his attitude and his efforts he put forth in our community.

Kenney called Thomas "a man in his prime, cut down at age 33. We will miss him. It's a sad time."

Kenney also invited senators to co-sponsor his bill encouraging spinal cord research in Missouri, saying it would be a tribute to

Thomas and passenger Michael Tellis, 49, were not wearing seat belts and were thrown from the vehicle. Tellis was killed and Thomas' spine and neck were broken. The third person in the car, who was wearing his seat belt, suffered only minor injuries.

Thomas was brought to the hospital in Miami, his hometown, where doctors stabilized his spinal column with screws, rods and hooks and grafted bone from his hip. Though he was paralyzed from the chest down, doctors had been hopeful he would be able to walk again.

Jackson Memorial is the home of the Miami Project to Cure Paralysis, the world's largest spinal cord injury research center, and its surgeons have operated on injured athletes including race car driver Emerson Fittipaldi.

An All-American at Alabama, the 6-foot-3, 255-pound Thomas became an immediate star as a pass-rushing specialist after being taken in the first round of the 1989 draft. He was an All-Pro in his first nine seasons and ranked ninth on the all-time list with 126.5 career sacks.

He set the single-game sack record in 1990 in a game against Seattle. That game was the same week as Veterans Day and Thomas dedicated his performance to his father, an Air Force pilot killed in Vietnam.

Thomas and countless others with spinal cord injuries.

In Kansas, state Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood, said, "Derrick Thomas was obviously an all-star on the field, his exploits on the football field will long be remembered."

"He was also someone who took his celebrity and converted it into good works in our community."

"His personal charitable works made a difference in the lives of a lot of young people in Kansas City. So, with his passing we've lost not only a sports hero but a hero for a lot of people who looked up to him as a role model and an example."

Thomas was beloved by many. "It's absolutely incredible the feeling toward Derrick Thomas that we've seen on a nationwide level," said Chiefs owner Lamar Hunt, who's received mail for Thomas at his Dallas home from across the country. "It's just indicative of the appeal and the personality and the vital life that he had."

Bush wins Delaware; candidates look ahead to S.C.

By RON FOURNIER
Associated Press

WILMINGTON, Del. — Republican George W. Bush won Delaware's presidential primary Tuesday and earned a badly needed lift into the next stage of contests, even as chief rival John McCain buried his insurgent campaign with a solid finish in a state he ignored.

"I think this is a piece of good news that will buoy our supporters," the Texas governor told The Associated Press after securing the state's 12 delegates.

McCain gloated over exit polls indicating a strong showing despite his decision to focus on the critical Feb. 19 primary in South Carolina at the expense of Delaware.

"It's really got to be remarkable to get these kinds of numbers in a primary in which you didn't even appear in the state," the Arizona senator told reporters. "We never even went there. We didn't spend a penny there."

The results were based on surveys of voters as they left polling precincts by Voter News Service, a consortium of The Associated Press and television networks.

McCain attributed his totals to the momentum generated by his shellack of Bush in New Hampshire's leadoff primary last week. Exit polls in Delaware supported his theory: Almost half of his supporters decided to vote for him in the week since New Hampshire. Scores of new voters backed McCain in a primary that was closed to all but registered Republicans, exit polls showed.

Conservative Steve Forbes, who spent more than $60 million on two successive presidential campaigns, appeared headed for a disappointing finish and was sure to be taking stock of his lagging effort.

At stake were just a dozen of the 2,066 delegates nominating delegates, but Bush and McCain were seeking a taller reward: A lift headed into South Carolina. Bush could not afford another loss, and McCain hoped to add to his momentum.

In addition to the top three candidates, conservative Alan Keyes was on the ballot, though he did not campaign here. Gary Bauer, who dropped out of the race last week, also was listed.

Exit polls showed Bush did best among voters who are middle class, elderly, conservative and believe he is likely to win the presidency. McCain voters tended to be affluent, well-educated and self-identified independents and moderates who said they were looking for a candidate who stands up for what he believes.

Forbes, who has pushed for a flat tax since his failed 1996 run, did well among voters who listed taxes as their top concern.

McCain's victory in New Hampshire erased Bush's lead in South Carolina and dramatically shrunk his advantage in California, Michigan, New York and national polls, as he sought to draw new and independent voters into the GOP fold.

The overheated rhetoric underscored what is at stake in upcoming contests. Despite his financial and organizational advantages, Bush faces a serious threat from the Arizona senator. And McCain, with just one victory under his belt, cannot afford losses to his party's front-runner.

South Carolina will test whether McCain is a one-state wonder or a contender who can foil Bush and his backers in the GOP establishment.

Forbes won Delaware's primary in 1996 and spent tens of thousands of dollars to build an organization this time around. Anything short of a strong second-place finish would force him to take stock of his campaign.

Forbes, campaigning to the last at a nursing home, pledged to end inheritance taxes as part of his flat tax plan.

"You should be allowed to leave this world unmolested by the IRS," he told about 60 senior citizens in a reception room down the hall from a polling place.

With little hope in South Carolina, he was flying to Michigan, which has its Republican primary Feb. 22.

The Delaware primary yielded the winner only 12 convention delegates, and perhaps a spurt of momentum heading into South Carolina. Voters had just 28 precinct locations to visit, a fraction of the usual 400 — a dynamic that analysts said favored Bush, who is backed by the GOP establishment.

Diversity encouraged in Student Governing Association

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Leo Prieto, senior in modern languages, was hoping to make a difference when he was on Student Senate and when he ran for student body president last year. He said he wanted to encourage more multicultural representation in student government.

"We needed to have it more diversified," he said. "I thought me being in that type of position, it would sort of have a domino effect."

Despite his efforts, Prieto said there still is a problem with multicultural students being underrepresented on campus.

There now are two multicultural senate interns and one multicultural student on Student Body President Jason Heinrich's cabinet.

Heinrich said he has made it a point to try and diversify appointments throughout student government, but he doesn't know the diversity of some of the other non-elected positions.

Heinrich recently organized two workshops about getting involved and running a campaign that were targeted toward multicultural students.

Heinrich said about 30 people went to the workshops, and he said he thought those people benefited a lot from them. However, he said he was disappointed with the multicultural student turnout.

"I'm really not sure why we didn't get underrepresented groups there," he said.

Heinrich said Student Governing Association members went and visited multicultural groups to let them know about the workshops.

Prieto, who helped with the first workshop, said he also was disappointed with the turnout of multicultural students, but he said he thinks he understands why.

"It would help if there were already people in place, so they could have some type of structure and they could know what to do," he said.

However, Prieto said it does work both ways.

"It's not just the organizers. It's also the students," he said. "You can't really put the blame on anyone, but you can learn from it, evaluate it and make some improvements."

In the past, people have brought up the idea of having multicultural seats on Senate. Prieto said he didn't know if this would be a solution, but he said he thinks some action needs to be taken.

"When you talk about trying to diversify the student representation, you have to come from all angles," he said. "You have to be willing to change; it doesn't hurt to try."

Korb Maxwell, University of Kansas student body president, said he has talked to Heinrich about KU's election system.

Maxwell said KU's Student Senate doesn't have specialty seats for multicultural students, but its election system results in multicultural students being represented.

KU's system consists of a presidential and vice presidential candidate forming a party or coalition where they choose the senators they want to run with them. The students vote on the whole party rather than individual presidential tickets and senators.

"It really helps multicultural and minority representation in your coalition because what you're doing is going out and looking for

Multicultural representation debated on multiple campuses

Multicultural representation in student governments is an issue debated on other college campuses in the Big 12 Conference.

Matt Craft, Iowa State University student body president, said ISU has four specialty seats on its Student Senate: a seat for a disabled student, a nontraditional seat, a minority seat and an international seat.

"It gets its job done as far as providing a voice for those students," he said. However, Craft said there are some students who criticize this system. He said they think everyone should go through the normal process of getting elected.

"The bottom line, though, was that ethnic and minority students weren't being represented through the normal process, and now they are," he said.

Oklahoma State also has had concerns about multicultural representation, but OSU's Student Senate doesn't provide specialty seats.

"In our answer to that, we have tried to publicize our Senate chairs to the

Motorcycle, vehicle collide in intersection

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A motorcycle collided with a vehicle early Wednesday evening at the intersection of 12th and Fremont streets.

Officer Eduardo Maldonado of the Riley County Police Department said the motorcyclist, Matthew Holthaus, junior in open-option, was transported to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue for back and neck injuries after striking the left side of a truck driven by John Jackson, freshman in architecture.

A house supervisor at Mercy said she spoke with Holthaus briefly and would not be surprised if he needed to spend Wednesday night in the hospital.

"He has a lot of scratches and bruises and a cut under his eye," Wade Schmeltz, Holthaus' roommate, said. "He's pretty banged up, but he's doing all right."

Jackson said he had made a complete stop before pulling into the intersection of 12th and Fremont directly before the accident.

Maldonado, who said he had spoken with Jackson directly after the accident, said he would visit Holthaus after his release from the hospital.

"We're still investigating, and we'll interview him to determine the cause of the accident," Maldonado said.

Chemistry department gets grant to research weapons

K-State's Department of Chemistry has received a grant from the Department of Defense for equipment to research materials that could be used to combat chemical weapons.

University distinguished professor of chemistry Kenneth Klabunde has been doing research of nano particles. He was out of the country and could not be reached for comment.

The professor has taken materials such as magnesium oxide and formed a powder that has many tiny crystals, said Peter Sherwood, head of the chemistry department.

Student senators to debate proposal to ban smoking in public places

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Body President Jason Heinrich's proposal to recommend a smoking ban in public places will be debated by student senators tonight, after being introduced in Student Senate last Thursday.

The resolution, which has no legislative value, calls for the Manhattan City Commission to take steps to adopt a citywide ordinance prohibiting smoking in all work places, bars and restaurants.

As Heinrich expected, the initiative has begun to stir up controversy. "This will be a controversial issue," Heinrich said. "No doubt about it. People will disagree, but that's the beauty of it. If it's something you truly believe in, you have to try and overcome all of those issues."

Business Sen. Daniel Cooper, who will speak against the resolution, said the authors said that if the resolution were passed by Senate, City Commission probably would water it down before it became law — making it less severe.

Nevertheless, Cooper said the proposal overlooks K-State students who frequent bars.

"It is too severe. The majority of the people who go to bars are smoking," he said. "A lot of people aren't in touch with the opinions of the Aggieville people. I think this will upset more people than it will make happy."

"I question the motive of this resolution. I think it's just an attention grabber."

Heinrich said Senate should address the issue, though, because of the health effects of secondhand smoking.

Gail Urban, executive director of the Community Health Council, said a smoking ban in public places is a health issue in Manhattan, but it won't be on the city's agenda until it gains student backing.

"I told Heinrich that we would be supportive, but I cautioned him on the method that he should take," she said. "We told him to develop a plan and to be sure all members of the community and government are well aware of the plan."

Urban said a survey of Riley County residents, based on a Community Health forum, found that tobacco use was one of three crucial health issues in the area.

"Smoking in Riley County is less than the statewide average," Urban said. "But they felt it was an important issue. The community wanted to see that the issue was addressed."

Commissioner Carol Peak said smoking is a concern but still not a city issue yet.

"This certainly starts a discussion about it," she said. "But it's only a discussion. We're just listening and watching. It's a locally controlled issue. It depends a lot on the local culture whether or not a smoking ordinance would be passed. Public input is the beginning."

Regardless of whether a smoking ban becomes top priority on the City Commission's plate, proposals for smoking bans haven't been commonplace in Kansas.

Dennis Carpenter, chief executive officer of the Kansas Restaurant and Hospitality Association, said there have been only two attempts for smoking ordinances in Kansas.

The Overland Park smoking ordinance bans smoking in fast food restaurants, while the other proposal is being debated and reviewed by Topeka's City Council.

Topeka's ordinance calls for a smoking ban in restaurants and has been split into two committees: the Economic Impact Committee and the Public Health and Safety Committee.

Duane Pomeroy, Topeka City Council member and chairman of the economic development committee, said the vote on the decision probably will be very close.

Pomeroy said his committee has heard testimony claiming that restaurant owners would be negatively effected by a smoking ban. Pomeroy said it would be likely that the economic development committee would find that a ban on smoking would be harmful to businesses.

"A truck stop in Topeka claims that they would lose a lot of their business," he said. "Truckers like to take a break and relax. The restaurant claims that the truckers would go to Lawrence where there isn't a smoking ban."

But Heinrich said statistics from the Department of Family Medicine

Experts to reconstruct crash that killed 10 on interstate

LEE'S SUMMIT, Mo. — Experts in reconstructing accidents will begin work this week on a 31-vehicle crash that killed 10 people on Jan. 23.

"We are spending a lot of time interviewing and reinterviewing drivers and witnesses," said Sgt. Jack McMillen of the Missouri State Highway Patrol. "It's just going really slow."

Reconstructionists had been busy working on fatality accidents on Interstate 70 in Blue Springs, Mo., McMillen said.

Typically, investigators study paint transfer among vehicles, tire tracks and skid marks to determine how an accident occurred. In this case, the cars were so badly burned investigators couldn't examine paint marks, McMillen said. The wreck happened on icy roads, so the tire tracks melted.

"Our physical evidence has been destroyed," he said.

Investigators don't expect a final report for about three or four weeks.

The week after the crash, McMillen said he thought a semi tractor-trailer slid sideways first on Interstate 29 near Platte City, Mo. It stopped, but a car tried to slow and slid and hit a second semi. When that truck slid, the pileup began, he said.

Channel's Valentine special honors gay, lesbian movies

NEW YORK — The Independent Film Channel coyly titles its Valentine's Day marathon the "It Ain't Just Boy Meets Girl Festival."

The reality — a four-film collection of gay and lesbian-theme movies — still is somewhat bold for television, where same-sex kisses are considered unusual enough to make news.

IFC, a pay cable network that reaches 30 million, or roughly one-third, of the nation's television homes, will kick off its festival with "Beautiful Thing," a love story about two teen-age boys in London.

"What's great about what IFC is doing is they are tying it to a romantic holiday, which is unusual," said Scott Seomin, entertainment media director for the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation. "In television, it seems like there's an ongoing theme that it's OK to be a gay or a lesbian as long as it's a punch line."

Gay TV characters tend to be the wisecracking next-door neighbors, with their love lives left unexplored, he said.

A televised gay film festival isn't unprecedented, though. Cable's Sundance Channel has, for the past two years, run several homosexual-themed movies in prime time in connection with Gay Pride Month, he said.

IFC said it simply was trying to devise a gimmick. Last year its Valentine's Day festival was "Love Stinks," and around the holidays, it paid tribute to director David Lynch with "The Lynch Who Stole Christmas."

"We're not making a political point," said Frances Berwick, the network's senior vice president of programming. "We're just presenting great films."

The network hasn't heard any complaints from viewers and doesn't anticipate any, Berwick said.

Other films, which run in order starting at 7 p.m., include "Go Fish," about a relationship between two young women; "The Incredibly True Adventures of Two Girls in Love," about a couple with different economic and ethnic backgrounds; and "Love and Human Remains," about sexual and gender politics.

Seomin predicted large numbers of gays and lesbians would watch.

"We just really never get to see the love lives, the heartaches and the romantic joys between two men and two women," he said.

Basketball player charged with misdemeanor in death

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Pro basketball player David Wesley has been charged with two misdemeanors for allegedly racing down a city street with teammate Bobby Phillips, who was killed when his car crashed.

Citations served Tuesday charge the Charlotte Hornets guard with misdemeanor speed competition and reckless driving in connection with the Jan. 12 crash, his attorney Ed Hinson said.

Police said Phillips and Wesley were racing at more than 100 mph when Phillips lost control of his Porsche, crossed into oncoming traffic and hit another car.

Flu bug. Nearly twice as many Kansans already have died of flu-related causes this year as in all of last year.

The 39 deaths blamed so far this year on influenza come amidst significant increases in hospital admissions for influenza.

That compares to all of last year, when 21 deaths in the state could be attributed to influenza, according to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

Some of the 1999 deaths could have come in December, when the current flu season began. Usually in Kansas, the flu season begins in January and tapers off in March.

People also seem to be getting sicker this year. Hospitals have been admitting more people for pneumonia, the most common serious complication from flu.

At Wichita's Via Christi Regional Medical Center-St. Francis Campus, 201 people were admitted during the first six weeks of the year. That compares with 142 for the same period last year, said Paula Ghazarian, infection control coordinator.

More people also are testing positive for influenza now than a year ago. In Wesley Medical Center's clinics last month, 67 patients tested positive for influenza. Last year there were just nine in January.

Experts say it's too early to tell why the flu hit so hard this season. They do know it hit earlier than usual.

According to the Federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, patients nationwide started going to their doctors with flu complaints seven to eight weeks earlier than they did last flu season. In addition, the percentage of deaths related to flu was higher this season than in the previous three flu seasons.

Officer regulates campus

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An anonymous voice calls into the Campus Forum every so often to complain about bike cops.

"This is for the bike cop. I just want to let him know I'm getting in shape, and I'm going to blow through one of those dismount zones, and he ain't gonna be able to catch me."

That was Monday.

"Hey bike cop. This is the leader of the new bike gang, and today, we're going to break all the bicycle rules."

That was Wednesday.

The officer these unidentified callers are referring to is Don Stubbings, K-State Police officer.

He starts his day at 7:45 a.m., gets briefed on the previous night's events, does a bicycle safety check and then stretches before his 8-hour ride.

"The most challenging thing is to have cyclists on campus obey all the regulations," Stubbings said.

He said he approaches bikers whom he stops and tells them he needs a moment of their time. He hands them a regulation packet and tells why he stopped them.

"There's been one or two students who believe there shouldn't be any bike regulations," Stubbings said. "I don't have many negative reactions. I don't turn into a jerk. That's not me."

Stubbings went to school last year in Topeka to join the International Police Mountain Bike Association, something he said helps him talk to students.

"A lot of students have great mountain bikes, and we can talk about that," he said. "It's a great way to build a working relationship with them."

Although Stubbings also works with Parking Services to ticket illegally parked bikes, he said he focuses mostly on dismount zones. Some pedestrians get hit, and he's out there for their safety, he said.

It's been a year since Stubbings started patrolling on his bike, and since then, he's made 131 stops. None of them have been repeat offenders, which shows the regulations are working, he said.

Stubbings said the community policing is what he enjoys most.

"The exercise is good. Being out in the fresh air is excellent. You're out with the public," he said.

K-State Patrol Officer Oscar Ruiz said he enjoyed this, too, when he was patrolling on his bicycle.

"I thought it was a good opportunity to stay in shape and keep in contact with people," Ruiz said.

During this winter season, however, Ruiz uses his patrol car when he works the midnight to 8 a.m. shift. Once it gets warmer, Ruiz said he also will be patrolling the city, making sure bicyclists turn on their lights when riding from dusk to dawn.

He said enforcing the law is challenging, especially when you see people every day and recognize them not by name but by face. The way people act makes it hard, too, Ruiz said.

"People just try to ignore you," he said. "They think if they just ignore you, that you'll disappear or something."

The most unusual moment for him, he said, came when he had to stop a professor who had ridden her bike across campus for years, even before the dismount and mount zones were created.

"She was one of those who wanted to ignore me," Ruiz said.

But there are K-State students who agree with these rules.

Linda Heyd, sophomore in architecture, said she doesn't mind the dismount-mount zone rules.

"I don't have a problem with them because I ride on the streets anyway," she said. "Also, I really don't want to run over people."

Nicholls applying for job at NIU

■ Dean of arts, sciences
1 of 4 candidates up for university president post.

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Peter Nicholls, dean of arts and sciences, is one of the four presidential candidates for Northern Illinois University.

Nicholls served at NIU for more than two decades before his nine-year tenure at K-State.

If Nicholls is chosen for the position, leaving K-State would be difficult, he said.

"I am not doing this because I want to move from K-State. I really love K-State," Nicholls said.

He said the opportunity is for a higher career move.

Last November, Nicholls turned in his application and since has interviewed once with NIU officials. The NIU Board of Trustees is expected to announce a campus interview schedule soon. That interviewing process would last a couple of days, he said. The final decision should be made in March.

Nicholls leads K-State's largest college-based fundraising operation, resulting in an annual average of $6 million in private gifts for the university. Two years ago he team-taught a new honors calculus course.

The people at K-State are what Nicholls said he would miss if he was selected.

"If I were to leave K-State, I would miss the people at the university the most," Nicholls said. "From the students, who are some of the finest students that I have ever seen, right up to President Wefald, who is an outstanding leader."

Dennis Wilson, assistant dean of arts and sciences, said this is a great opportunity for Nicholls.

Wilson described Nicholls as a man who can be serious, entertaining and humorous. Wilson said top executives need someone who can be humorous.

"If they chose him they would be getting someone that can joke and be serious," he said. "And he is very efficient."

Prior to his position at K-State, for 20 years Nicholls taught mathematics at NIU. He then was promoted from assistant to associate of mathematics, then to full professor.

Nicholls served as the associate dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences at Northern from 1987 until 1991. He served as the acting dean at NIU in 1988.

Since Nicholls served on the staff at NIU, he said he is knowledgeable of its programs.

"It is a school I know very well. I know the departments and the programs," Nicholls said. "I have a great deal of respect for the university."

Group encourages women to succeed in earning engineering, science degrees

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Female graduates always have been a minority in science and engineering programs, but K-State's Women in Engineering and Science Program is developing a plan to change that.

The colleges of Engineering and Arts and Sciences established the Women in Engineering and Science Program to retain and recruit more female students.

The program has a five-year goal of raising the amount of female engineering students from the current 14 percent to 25 percent.

A mentoring program for freshmen is one of the first things the program has worked on in order to retain and recruit female students.

Suzanne Franks, program director, said a proposal was written and funds were received from the Exxon Mobile Foundation to start the program.

"We received the funds to begin the program in fall of 2000," Franks said.

Franks said the mentoring program is one of the best ways to start the recruitment because it shows the new students a sense of camaraderie.

"Evidence shows that mentoring programs are one of the best ways to retain and recruit students," Franks said. "The incoming freshmen are going to have a sort of big sister to help them make decisions and decide what field of engineering is for them."

Franks said the program will consist of 24 female students and 12 mentors.

"The mentors will let the freshman students know about events, put them in contact with upperclassmen and give them information about the different majors," Franks said.

The mentoring program will deal with students who are undecided in the College of Engineering.

"We are only offering the program to women who are undecided at first," Franks said. "But if it does not fill up, it will be open to all women in engineering."

The program is being overseen by three undergraduate program managers. Stella Houston, senior in computer sciences; Kim Precht, senior in environmental, biological and agricultural engineering; and Elizabeth Schroeder, junior in environmental, biological and agricultural engineering, are taking on the task.

Houston said she decided to get involved with the mentoring program because she wanted to open up to the new students.

"One of the things that amazes me about the College of Engineering is that it has always been kind of hard and impersonal," Houston said. "I think that with the mentoring program we will be able to make it more interpersonal for the new women coming in."

Schroeder said she realizes how hard it is to decide what major to pick and is looking forward to helping new students make their decisions.

"I really want female students to have a good experience," Schroeder said. "I think that with this program we will be able to retain more women students."

Franks said she believes the mentoring program will be a successful way to keep women in the College of Engineering.

"One of the best things we could do is to have a mentoring program," Franks said. "I believe that with programs that prove to be successful like this one, we can accomplish our goals."

All students need representation in Senate

Student Senate seriously needs to consider modifications to its representation structure.

While creating specialty seats, such as the ones at other universities, might not be the answer, some changes are needed. Yet Senate is slow to recognize the need for change.

In a meeting earlier this semester, Heath Schroeder, senior in finance, presented concerns with the fact that 55 percent of Senate is greek, compared to only 20 percent of the student body. Rather than heed his concerns, senators mocked and ridiculed him.

Not only was this treatment of a constituent whom they are supposed to represent blatantly disrespectful and totally uncalled for, it is also an example of ignoring a valid complaint.

Senate undoubtedly is over-represented by the greek population. While there are explanations for this — such as higher greek voting rates — an explanation does not equal a cure.

Certainly, some of the weight should fall on the shoulders of non-greeks to get out and vote. But there are independents who do vote, and they have more difficulty getting elected because greek organizations encourage voting en masse.

This is not a knock against greeks. Their encouragement should be applauded, as it mimics the real world.

However, those independents who do wish to get involved should be given a chance to represent other groups. Senate should consider restructuring, possibly to have seats based on living situation — greek, off-campus or on-campus.

Perhaps this isn't the best way to structure the system. Maybe encouraging non-greeks to vote will help. Certainly online voting is a step in the right direction.

It is clear something needs to be done to ensure more balanced representation.

Proof of the problem lies in the treatment Schroeder received during his presentation to Senate.

Senators, here's your chance to redeem yourselves. Take Schroeder's advice and do your job. He has a complaint — now find a way to fix the problem.

Allow everyone, regardless of greek affiliation, an equal chance to become a student senator.

READERS write

Strength should come from within ourselves

Editor,

After reading Jeff Elliott's column on Tuesday, I would just like to say that I disagree with the notion that one needs to rely on any kind of religious faith to be fulfilled in life.

As an agnostic, I have no faith or belief in God. However, my life has great meaning. The meaning of my life is in the relationships I have with others. Constructing relevant relationships with people, whether it is through word or deed, is what fulfills my life.

Some of us are self-reliant. Many self-reliant people neither need nor want to believe in or rely on the supernatural. When times get tough we do not look to Jesus, Muhammad, Buddha or any other religious leader.

We look, rather, to ourselves.

—Paul Youk

Collegian becoming forum for Christianity

Editor,

The column by Jeff Elliott did not belong as the main article of the opinion page.

Is this a religious seminar? His column was nothing less than pure proselytization of the Christian faith. This is a state university that receives federal funding, so it therefore is beholden to federal statutes and the First Amendment.

I tire of reading these columns every week. You will not find other religions trying to win converts this way. It is offensive. Are you willing to hire opinion writers to proselytize for other religions? For them to denigrate Christianity? I think not.

If Elliott and Scott Roney really want to do such things, then make them pay for an advertisement in the church section.

NATIONALISM'S RESURGENCE poses threat to world

The dark clouds of nationalism are gathering across the face of the globe.

Nationalism is not based on a love for one's country, but an unfounded xenophobia of other countries. Nationalism promotes cultural and ethnic chauvinism and the fear that other cultures and ethnicities will degrade and eventually destroy the fabric of the native society.

Leaders of nationalistic political parties are opportunists who encourage, then prey off the fears of the ignorant who are perpetually afraid of an ever-changing and shrinking world.

Fearful people are lonely people. Nationalistic leaders con fearful people into a group held together only by a common fear.

But fearful people are unmotivated people; thus, nationalistic leaders turn the fear into hate, and once they hate, they can be motivated into destroying what scares them.

Increased globalization of the world's economy has resulted in a movement of unskilled jobs from first- to third-world countries where labor is cheap. As wealth gathers in first-world countries, immigrants are drawn to these nations. This creates a xenophobic population afraid of losing jobs to foreigners abroad or immigrants at home.

The typical nationalist political platform is anti-immigration and to establish protective tariffs and comforting social programs, all of which are designed to preserve the employment and culture at home.

All nations have their nationalist. In the U.S., we have Pat Buchanan, whose political ideology is exactly that described above. Buchanan's insidious nature not only preys off unskilled laborers' fears of losing employment, but also parental fears of not getting their children into the best universities, vis-à-vis. his stance that the best universities are filled up with too many Asians and Jews, according to the Sept. 27, 1999, issue of U.S. News and World Report.

Fortunately, Buchanan and far-right groups in the United States (i.e. the various white supremacist groups) are for the time being marginalized.

Austria: Last week, the right of center People's Party formed a coalition with the nationalistic Freedom Party. The new Cabinet consists of six ministers from the People's Party (chancellor, foreign affairs, economics, agriculture and environment, interior, and education) and six from the Freedom Party (vice chancellor, defense, finance, social affairs, infrastructure and justice). This is the first time since WWII that nationalists held any ministerial posts in Europe.

The Freedom Party is xenophobic and anti-European Union.

The leader of the Freedom Party, Joerg Haider, has made sympathetic remarks about the Nazis, including praise for Adolph Hitler's "orderly employment" policies and has described Waffen SS veterans as "decent people of good character."

In an attempt to broaden his appeal, Haider has apologized for his statements, but with questionable sincerity. Haider has said Austria needs to compensate Austrian Jews who were persecuted during WWII, but then he links it to Czechs' need to compensate the ethnic Germans who were expelled from

Sudetenland after WWII. (Before WWII, ethnic Germans made up 22 percent of Czechoslovakia's population, most of whom supported the Nazis and became Hitler's excuse for invading this country.)

Haider professes respect toward all ethnic groups yet maligns Poles as car thieves, Russians as blackmail and mugging experts and blacks as drug dealers.

Switzerland: In October elections, the far-right People's Party captured the largest share of votes. The People's Party, led by industrialist Christoph Blocher, is anti-immigrant, anti-European Union and anti-United Nations. The post-election coalition prevented the People's Party from obtaining a second seat on the seven-member Swiss federal council.

Italy: In 1994, the conservative coalition government included the parties the Northern League and the National Alliance, both heirs to Benito Mussolini's Fascists.

Turkey: April, 1999 elections resulted in the ultra-rightist Nationalist Action Party (MHP) in second place with 18 percent of the vote (the secular Democratic Left Party came in first with 22 percent of the vote). The MHP ideology is based on pan-Turanism; that all Turkic peoples from the Balkans to China are part of one great nation. Paramilitary groups associated with the MHP were responsible for killing thousands of leftists and Kurds in the late 1970s.

India: The Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party leads India's coalition government. While in recent years the BJP have become more centrist for coalition purposes, this group has in the past been responsible for destroying mosques and churches.

Japan: April, 1999, Hawkish nationalist Shintaro Ishihara was elected governor of Tokyo. Ishihara made a career being combative and urging Japan to take stronger stands against the United States and China. This is in a country in which cabinet officials have expressed sympathy toward the Japanese invasions of Korea and China during WWII and at best has done an extremely poor job at facing up to their wartime atrocities.

Nationalism resulted in WWII, which left a good chunk of civilization in rubble. Nationalism resulted in genocide in the Balkans and the dissolution of Yugoslavia. Nationalism resulted in the slaughter of perhaps a million in Rwanda and Burundi.

Human beings are more alike than dissimilar. We must not fear each other. What we must do is to learn to love each other, or we shall perish.

Clinton makes her new home in New York — almost

The nation first met Hillary Rodham Clinton when her husband ran for president in 1992. We were introduced to a politically savvy lawyer and faithful wife. Since then, we have grown either to hate or love her. Either way, she is undeniably ambitious.

Take a minute to compare yourself to her.

When she was in college, she organized food drives, served in student government and was a member of the National Honor Society. She met Bill Clinton in law school, and after they were married, they set their sights on politics.

Clinton knew where she was headed at a young age. How about you?

Clinton might have taken her most ambitious step Sunday by formally announcing her campaign to be a U.S. senator from New York.

In front of 2,000 supporters, her husband, mother and daughter, Clinton entered the race against still undeclared opponent New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani.

In declaring her bid, she entered an arena unwelcome to women. No woman has ever been independently elected to statewide office in New York, and no other first lady has ever run for public office before.

In her address to supporters on Sunday, she said: "Politics is the art of making possible what appears to be impossible. We can do what seems impossible if we have the vision, the passion and the will to get there."

She will have to have a lot of vision and passion, and she will have to overcome the doubts of New Yorkers. The most common criticisms of Clinton are that she is not from New York and that she is too aloof for the public.

The first criticism stems from our democratic tradition that government should be representative of the people.

Under that tenant, Clinton needs to represent the people of New York, but can she do that when she has no life experience in the state? Nor does she have any intimate knowledge of the issues of her constituency.

Detractors believe she has no real love of New York. They just happen to be close to Washington, D.C., and have menial criteria for congresswomen.

Rep. Charles Rangel tried to replace the residency issue with Clinton's ability to get the job done.

On Sunday, Rangel said, "If you want the best people to win, you don't ask them where they are from. You ask them if they are available."

If Clinton and her advisers continue spinning with such success, the residency factor might fall by the wayside.

The second criticism Clinton faces deals with her aloofness and rigidity.

Polls comment that she lacks a down-to-earth demeanor and public accessibility. Before her announcement Sunday, Clinton had 200 friends discuss the way to win in New York. At the meeting, she was told she needed to lose the image of tough professional and become more compassionate, dare I say they mean domestic. The issue also was raised that she needs to distance herself from being first lady and focus on wooing New York.

The effect of that meeting has her fixing omelets and tossed salad in public appearances. This new image is a far cry from the 1996 professional, invincible Clinton. But it will take more than omelets and tossed salad to win back the crucial support of women voters who demand integrity and not spinning.

If Clinton can manage to downplay the fact that she is not from New York and find a balance in personality that the people like, she has a great shot.

After all, the race for senator in New York will have nothing to do with the issues and everything to do with a winning personality. May the best candidate win.

Locally born artist's work on display at Beach museum through March Rénee Stout's "Palms Read" was purchased for the museum's permanent collection. Stout said inspiration for the piece came from Madam Ching, a woman from her childhood.

By SARAH MCCAFFREY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Locally born artist Rénee Stout is exhibiting selected artwork at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art through March 26.

Stout was born in Junction City but grew up in Pittsburgh, Pa. She now lives and works in Washington, D.C.

Stout's work is based on her personal experiences. She incorporates many aspects of her cultural upbringing into her artwork.

"Rénee is very interested in a lot of aspects of African culture, hoodoo, the American version of voodoo and palmistry," Bill North, Beach art museum curator, said.

North said African and Kongo influences are apparent in several of the pieces on display. "Church of the Crossroads" and "Seer's Objects" are examples of Stout's fascination with the mystical and spiritual realms.

Modern feminist influences also are present in the exhibit. The number of feminist painters in the art world is quite small, making Stout's exhibit at K-State even more significant, said Torry Dickinson, associate professor of women's studies.

"There hasn't been much female leadership in the art field," Dickinson said. "It's important to see someone develop her own artistic style."

Dickinson said the exhibit offers students an opportunity to experience the viewpoints of a black female through the varied mediums Stout employs.

Featured in the display are photographs, artifacts and monotypes, including two neon pieces.

"I think it's incredibly fascinating to have something like this at K-State," Dickinson said. "It's important for anyone to see something that makes you think so broadly."

The complexity of Stout's work allows for a broad variety of interpretations.

"I thought it was very unique," Crystal Becker, freshman in open-option, said. "It was interesting to see how she portrayed her beliefs. She wasn't afraid to show her inner feelings."

Other visitors had difficulty finding the connection between the different mediums.

"It was interesting. I didn't quite understand what prompted the paintings," Jill Oswald, freshman in pre-health, said.

North said it's all right for visitors to be confused about the exhibit because of the diversity of subjects covered in Stout's work.

"It's material that is a bit challenging and forces you to think about some things," he said.

"It was interesting to see how she portrayed her beliefs."

Phi Delta Theta house construction still delayed; fund raising continues

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's the house that Jack hasn't built — yet.

When the Phi Delta Theta fraternity sold its previous residence to the Delta Chi fraternity in 1998, a new $2.5 million house was scheduled to be completed this fall.

However, construction has yet to begin, and most of its members are scattered throughout Manhattan.

Mike Goodpasture, member of Phi Delt and president of the Interfraternity Council, said construction has been delayed because the former house was sold to Delta Chi before any plans had been made for the new house.

"It took a year to develop a plan with the permits and zoning regulations needed from the city as well as the architecture plans," Goodpasture said. "It then took another six to eight months to get things straightened out with the alumni and to set up a committee to handle the fund raising."

Goodpasture said the Kansas Gamma Foundation, a group of Phi Delt alumni, is handling much of the fund-raising efforts to build the new house. The house, which will be constructed at 2216 Claflin Road, is set to begin construction in May and will be completed by August 2001.

He said there is a house on the land where the new house will be, that is serving as a central meeting location for chapter and committee meetings. He said the rest of the members are living throughout Manhattan, and a couple of houses are acting as pseudo-houses for the time being.

Casey Bohr, member of Phi Delt and freshman in business, said although fraternity members are not under one roof but living all over the city, the fraternity still is one group and looking forward to living together in the future.

"We would rather have a house where we could all live, but the new house will bring us all together again next year," Bohr said. "The Phi Delt that are scattered throughout Manhattan are all living with other Phi Delt, so we are all together just in different places."

Fraternity members await new house on Claflin Road to be completed in 2001. House on planned spot serves as meeting place for chapter, members.

Goodpasture said a deal is in the works for renting either the former Acacia or Phi Kappa Theta houses. Alumni also are consulting with McCullough Development about renting an entire apartment complex to the fraternity, so members can be closer together.

Bohr said the Phi Delt are looking forward to moving into the new house next year. He said there still is a bond between the members, even though they presently are separated.

"We are looking forward to having a new house next year," Bohr said. "We all still go out and have chapter meetings, so there is still a good, strong bond between us."

More federal aid entices tuition raises

By ANJETTA MCQUEEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Senators complained to university officials Wednesday that more federal student loans and aid seem to be enticing colleges to raise their tuitions, and students and government cannot keep up.

"It is incumbent on us to take a serious look at the effect of this government spending on tuition rates," said Sen. Fred Thompson, R-Tenn., chairman of the Government Affairs Committee.

Tuitions at public and private schools overall have doubled in the past 20 years, after inflation, making college unaffordable for many families despite the $41 billion in annual federal grants and guaranteed loans, Thompson said.

Senators said they fear more federal aid could simply drive up college costs even more, speculating that states could raise public tuition caps — figuring more students could afford it because of a larger loan, a higher grant or a potential tax break on their bill.

Senators also said private schools might reduce their campus-based programs in favor of students who can afford to pay their own way with the help of federal loans and tax deductions.

College officials denied Wednesday that they were driving up tuition costs to take advantage of increases in federal aid and said there's little government can do to control costs.

"Tuition price controls will not work and will be destructive of academic quality in higher education," said William Trout, president of Rhodes College in Memphis, Tenn.

"It's hard to believe that parents would welcome a decision by the federal government to curtail severely their access to loan capital," said David Breneman, an education school dean at the University of Virginia.

Soaring price tags can be blamed on a handful of the most-expensive private schools catering to students who don't need aid, said Harvard economist Caroline Hoxby.

"There is no evidence that students are being forced to enroll in expensive colleges that are inappropriate for their level of preparedness," said Hoxby, pointing out that Education Department data also shows that since 1970, tuition at the least-expensive schools has actually dropped 15 percent.

Private schools cost an average $15,000 per year; public colleges charge about $3,300 annually. Nearly half of 14 million U.S. college students receive some sort of aid.

About 60 percent of the help a student gets to pay these bills comes from loans that average $3,000 a year, while grants make up less than 40 percent of available aid.

"If college becomes a luxury that an increasing percentage of our population cannot afford, it will expand the economic divide between the higher education haves and have-nots and stunt our economic growth," said Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., the committee's top Democrat.

During the two-day hearing that began Wednesday, the committee also plans to discuss merit-aid programs that offer discounts for high-performing students who might not be among the neediest and scholarship scams that ask parents for money to search for financial aid.

Tennis player adjusts to American customs, remains undefeated

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Petra Sedlmajerova still is picking up some of the nuances of American life. Understanding the language is still a little tricky, and not all of the customs quite make sense yet.

But unfortunately for her opponents, the game of tennis hasn't taken much figuring out.

"It's the same here," she said. "I can beat some really good players."

That might qualify as an understatement. In her first match this spring, the freshman pulled off the largest upset ever by a Wildcat, downing San Diego's Katarina Valkyova, the No. 3 player in the nation, 7-6, 6-1, and leading the Wildcats to their biggest upset ever, a 5-4 win over the No. 29 Toreros.

Sedlmajerova (pronounced "settle-muh-rova") has proven that her quick start was no fluke, remaining undefeated in all five of her singles matches for the 3-2 Wildcats, and losing only once in doubles play.

Head coach Steve Bietau said that given the volume of on- and off-court adjustments Sedlmajerova has had to make since arriving in August, her fast start is all the more impressive.

"To have the kind of results she has had as a freshman is definitely impressive," Bietau said. "She hasn't lost a set yet this semester, and it's not like our schedule is all that easy."

Bietau said because Sedlmajerova played primarily on clay courts in her hometown of Usti Nad Labem, her playing style has nuances that make it difficult for her hard court opponents to figure out.

"The way she hits her ground strokes is like someone throwing body punches in boxing, just pounding away at people," Bietau said. "Eventually, they just can't take it anymore and break down. She's very effective."

She learned her game from her father, who coached her in the Czech Republic, and honed it by playing against her younger sister. Now, Sedlmajerova said her successful transition to NCAA tennis has been helped by her new family on the K-State tennis team.

"Eva (Novotna', her doubles partner) and Natalia (Farmer) helped me a lot with telling me what I have to do here," she said. "I didn't know some things, like what I have to do in practice."

Despite the smooth transition, Sedlmajerova still is taken aback at times when she reflects on her sudden success.

"I know that I am able to play really well, but I was surprised," she said. "I think that I didn't believe in myself too much."

Does she believe in herself now?

"Sort of," she said. Sedlmajerova said that whether she is playing well thus far, there are still plenty of things she has yet to learn and more potential yet to be tapped.

"I should really work on the tactics of how to play," she said. "I can hit really good shots, but if I hit them in the wrong place, then it isn't so successful. That, and playing in the net."

Though her rapidly evolving tennis game is her calling card, Sedlmajerova said so far she is enjoying everything about her move to the United States.

"I had never hoped that I could come here," she said. "Everything is really great — my teammates and coach and everything in the school. All the people here are so nice to me. It was like a dream."

the SMELL of VICTORY

Women's team ends 5-game losing streak with victory over OSU

The K-State women's basketball program ended its five-game losing streak Wednesday by defeating Oklahoma State 71-64.

K-State was able to match the Cowboys throughout the first half, and it was shooting 46 percent from the field as a team. Still, the Cowboys were shooting 50 percent from field-goal range and led the Cats 38-37 at halftime.

Early in the second half, K-State went on a 15-2 run to build the lead to 52-40 at the 11:26 mark.

The Cowboys got a late surge of their own as they went on a 19-5 run to take a 59-57 lead with 5:23 left to play. From that point on, K-State held OSU to 10 percent shooting and hit 10 consecutive free throws.

K-State forward Nicky Ramage went 10-of-10 from the charity stripe, and she was also perfect down the stretch.

In the second half, OSU shot just 25 percent from the field and was 3-18 from three-point range.

Entering the game, K-State was looking to stop sharpshooting OSU senior guard Jennifer Crow, who entering the game was averaging 21 points per game.

Against K-State, Crow scored 22 points to lead all scorers and had 5 assists. However, K-State got some solid guard play of its own in sophomore guard Kristin Rethman. Rethman was able to complement K-State's inside players by scoring 18 points, including going 3 of 5 from three-point range.

The Cats got solid play inside from Ramage, who scored 16 points and grabbed seven rebounds. Fellow senior Angie Finkes scored 10 points with eight rebounds, and center Olga Firsova scored 12 points.

The victory was K-State's first in Stillwater since K-State head coach Jack Hartman's team won there in 1996. Next action for K-State is at 2 p.m. Sunday against Iowa State.

KU-K-State rivalry in hoops has faded

By SAM STIERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's basketball team rivalry with the University of Kansas has lost the intensity it once had, and some fans say the rivalry is a thing of the past.

"A rivalry only exists when both teams win," Nathan Hatterner, senior in kinesiology, said. "There is no rivalry between K-State and KU anymore, in football or basketball."

K-State's men's basketball team has lost 17 straight games to the Jayhawks, including an 87-79 loss earlier this year in Lawrence. In the 1990s, Kansas won 24 of the 26 games.

"I don't think it is much of a rivalry anymore," Jeff Gardner, senior in mechanical engineering, said. "I remember when I was little watching K-State beat KU at Ahearn Field House. Now we don't even play them close at home."

Kansas has won 16 straight games in Manhattan and has never lost in Bramlage Coliseum. K-State had no home wins against KU in the 90s. K-State's series with KU ranks seventh in NCAA history for total games played, with KU holding an impressive 155-88 all-time record over the Cats. However, the series has not always been so one-sided.

K-State traditionally has been a basketball school. The Cats posted a 28-22 record over Kansas from 1960 to 1970. These are the only decades K-State has won a majority of the games, but before the 1990s, the series was always close.

Still, no K-State coach has dominated KU. Tex Winter, who led the Cats to eight Big 8 Championships, was only able to post a 16-20 record against the Jayhawks. Winter's biggest victory against KU was in 1958 when he led K-State in a victory over a Wilt Chamberlain led KU team to capture the Big 8 title.

Since Winter left K-State, only one coach has been able to achieve a winning record against KU. Jack Hartman, K-State's winningest coach, led the Cats for 16 years and compiled a 23-21 record against KU.

Current K-State head coach Tom Asbury has yet to beat KU, and K-State hasn't won at home in more than 16 years. Even though the Cats have not always played KU close, K-State fans say it still is the biggest basketball game of the year, and they haven't given up hope.

"In my heart, I think we'll win, but in reality, I have to go with KU," Larry Brown, senior in business, said.

1999 football seniors to say final good-bye

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State football program, fresh off a signing day in which it signed 18 players for next season, will take one last look at the past on 7 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

This weekend, the Cats will be host to the K-State Football Awards ceremony. It will be a chance for fans to get one last look at Mark Simoneau, Darren Howard, Frank Murphy and the other graduating seniors.

"The players will have a chance to speak to the crowd and there will be several awards given," K-State Sports Information director Kent Brown said.

The program also has a video presentation planned, highlighting the past season's performances, a season in which K-State won the Culligan Holiday Bowl and compiled an 11-1 season.

"It will be the last chance to see the players and coaches this season and tell them thanks for what they have done," Brown said.

Tickets for the event are $3 for adults and $1 for students. The tickets to the event can be purchased either in advance or at the door.

Opportunities to compete for Olympics exist in K-State athletes

VIEWPOINT

There are hundreds, maybe thousands, of athletes training right now for the 2000 Olympics this summer in Sydney, Australia. Of these athletes, only a select few actually will be chosen to compete; the United States generally is considered to be the most difficult team to make.

That certainly doesn't discourage the K-State track team as numerous athletes, both current students and alumni, are training rigorously with plans to compete in the Olympic trials in Sacramento, Calif. this July.

While the women's team is known as a main contender in the Big 12 and nationwide, the men's team has not had as much collective team success. That's why it's sort of surprising to hear from head coach Cliff Rovelto that he expects 12 to 15 athletes in the trials and possibly four or five in the actual Olympics.

Did anyone know that our track team is that good?

The Cats already can boast because decathlete Attila Zsivoczky has made the Hungarian Olympic Team. But they also have athletes from the 1996 Olympics training right here in Manhattan.

It seems the first thought that comes to mind when one hears that there are Olympians training here simply is: Why?

The answers vary slightly from athlete to athlete, but the ones I interviewed pointed to two main answers: high quality athletes to train with and high quality coaches from whom they can learn.

Trying to get inside the mind of any athlete always is a challenge, but the track athletes are rather approachable and frank. They said while most of them knew from an early start that they had talent, the real key to success is knowing the level of commitment it takes.

They learned that quickly at K-State, where each of the top athletes were teaching the tricks of the trade to the next one. Assistant track coach Steve Fritz, who is training for the heptathlon in Sydney, said watching others at work is inspiring to him every day.

"It's always good being around good athletes because regardless of what event they're doing, there's some things that all people at that level have in common: they work hard, they pay attention to details, and they take care of themselves," Fritz said. "The more people like that you surround yourself with, the easier it is to get things done."

Erin Anderson, a pole-vaulter training for the Olympic trials and a senior, said she knew when she made the decision to attend K-State that this was a place for potential world caliber athletes.

"I graduated high school in 1996 and that was the year of the Olympics in Atlanta, and there were people here who had competed in the trials, and they told me what an incredible experience it was. So I knew K-State could give me those opportunities," Anderson said.

So, it's becoming clearer that athletes feed off each other, that in watching one person push herself, another realizes she should work harder. But the coaching aspect, well, that's a different story.

Rovelto probably is one of the most down-to-earth coaches I've ever met. When I ask him about the success of his program, his answer always relates to the athletes, not the coaching.

But he does know how to coach; that fact is undisputed. Rovelto coaches for the USA Track and Field development program, usually working with athletes in jumping events. But he also teaches coaches how to coach and even writes the curriculum for some coaching certification programs.

Yeah, the guy knows what he's talking about. Knowing what you're talking about and knowing how to convey that are two different things; Rovelto is extremely patient, at least with reporters, in explaining how his sport works.

Anderson considers Rovelto the best coach in the United States right now.

"Because he relates to athletes better than any coach I've seen," Anderson said.

The combination of committed, talented athletes and patient, knowledgeable coaches make the K-State track program what it is today. A team that, according to Rovelto, had more athletes than any other collegiate team competing in the 1996 trials, and more athletes than every one but UCLA in the 1996 Olympics.

It's a team that has produced Olympic gold medalists, world and national champions. And it's a team that, without many K-State supporters taking notice, has begun to make its mark both nationally and worldwide.

So, K-State fans who are bummed about the dismal basketball season can take heart—there are people here who know how to win and get the job done.

Autopsy confirms massive blood clot caused Thomas' death

By MARK LONG
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — Derrick Thomas' legs weren't red or swollen and his body temperature was normal.

There were no visible signs of a blood clot, doctors said Wednesday. But when Thomas was being moved from his hospital bed to a wheelchair on his way to therapy Tuesday morning, something triggered a massive blood clot in his pulmonary artery that provides blood and oxygen from the heart to the lungs.

Thomas, 33, told his mother he wasn't feeling well just before his eyes rolled back, said Dr. Frank Eismont, an orthopedic surgeon at Jackson Memorial Hospital.

The Chiefs star, who held the NFL record of seven sacks in a game, went into cardio-respiratory arrest. Thomas, paralyzed from the chest down in a car crash two weeks earlier, died minutes later.

The cause of death, confirmed Wednesday by an autopsy, is common for paralysis victims.

"A certain percentage of people with paralysis suffer from blood clots," said Dr. Barth Green, a neurosurgeon at Jackson Memorial Hospital. "Sometimes you can see them and sometimes they're hidden in the deeper veins of the body, and that's what happened with Derrick."

Between 3 percent and 15 percent of spinal cord injury patients suffer from blood clots, Green said.

Thomas was driving a car during a snowstorm Jan. 23 as he and two friends headed to the Kansas City International airport to fly to St. Louis for the NFC championship game. He lost control of the car, and it overturned several times.

Police said Thomas was speeding and weaving in traffic, but no charges were filed.

Thomas and passenger Michael Tellis, 49, were not wearing seat belts and were thrown from the car. Tellis was killed, and Thomas' spine and neck were broken. The third person in the car was wearing a seat belt and received slight injuries.

Thomas was brought to the hospital in Miami, his hometown, where he had surgery to repair his spinal column.

The nine-time Pro Bowl linebacker had been on blood thinners since the accident, doctors said. Therapists also used mechanical devices on Thomas daily that intermittently contracted his legs to help circulate blood.

"We took all the aggressive precautions that are available to people today," Green said. "It just wasn't enough."

Added Eismont, "If I were to have it all to do over again, I wouldn't do anything different."

Thomas had been progressing quickly in rehabilitation. He was allowed out of the hospital last weekend — although a nurse and a physician stayed with him — and he had been talking about returning to Kansas City, Mo. within the next few months, Dr. Jon Browne, Chiefs team physician, said.

A news conference had been discussed that would have informed the public of Thomas' upcoming moves.

Thomas left behind thousands of grieving fans and nearly as many friends and relatives trying to cope with his sudden death. He will be remembered in both Kansas City and Miami within the next 10 days.

Memorial services are set to begin in Kansas City and then move to Miami, Thomas' hometown and the place where he will be buried.

There will be a viewing Monday at Thomas' church in Kansas City, then a memorial service at Kemper Arena the following day, Chiefs president Carl Peterson said.

"I'm not sure it can hold all the people who want to attend," Peterson said. "It will be a public opportunity for Derrick's fans and friends to honor him."

Thomas will be transferred back to Miami, where there will be a viewing Feb. 18. He will be buried Feb. 19.

The reason for the delay is because Thomas' aunt, Edith Morgan's sister, died last weekend, Peterson said. Thomas' family will be at her funeral Saturday in Tallahassee.

A week before he died, Thomas dictated a thank you letter for the outpouring of support he and his family had received since the accident. It will be released soon, Peterson said.

An All-American at Alabama, the 6-foot-3, 255-pound Thomas became an immediate star as a pass-rushing specialist after being taken in the first round of the 1989 draft. He was an All-Pro in his first nine seasons and ranked ninth on the career list with 126 1/2 sacks.

Fans remember linebacker

By DOUG TUCKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Thousands of Derrick Thomas fans wheeled into an Arrowhead Stadium parking lot Wednesday in everything from rusty old pickup trucks to expensive luxury sedans — everybody with two things in common.

They wanted to pay their respects to the star linebacker who died Tuesday. And every single one of them seemed to be wearing a seat belt.

"It relieved a lot of grief, knowing that he touched so many lives," said Ira Truss, among those who spent hours at a candlelight vigil.

In the long run, persuading people to wear seat belts could be the most enduring legacy of all for the nine-time All-Pro who died Tuesday, just 16 days after being thrown from his car on an icy Missouri highway.

"This morning, when I took my daughter to school, we were talking about Derrick, and she helped me decorate the car with Chiefs' stuff," said Jeann Miller of Shawnee, Kan.

Before they pulled out of the driveway, 6-year-old Stephanie spoke up.

"Mom, you decorated the car for Derrick," she said. "Now put your seat belt on for him."

Miller wiped away tears.

"I never used to use my seat belt," she said. "Now I'll never fail to use it."

Baseball commissioner testifies at Rocker's hearing as others protest

By RONALD BLUM
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — With several dozen protesters — and a large inflatable rat — outside baseball's offices, John Rocker's attempt to overturn his suspension began Wednesday with commissioner Bud Selig as the leadoff witness.

The Atlanta Braves reliever, banned by Selig until May 1 for his comments about gays, foreigners and others, was largely silent as he walked into the Park Avenue skyscraper with union lawyers on the warm winter afternoon, saying several times, "Just be patient."

While no details were immediately available, Selig was expected to testify on the rationale of his decision and what precedents he considered.

"I just completed somewhere between five and six hours of testimony," Selig said as he left the building in the early evening. "I issued my suspension. It is what it is. Now it's in the hands of the arbitrator."

Atlanta City Councilman Derrick

Boazman, who has been critical of Rocker, and Braves president Stan Kasten were the other witnesses to testify before Shyam Das, baseball's new arbitrator.

Boazman brought along a group from Atlanta to protest. They were kept behind wooden police barricades as the hearing took place 31 floors above.

"It was basically to convey to the masses we were disappointed in the appeal," Boazman said. "We started this whole thing saying Rocker should be released. We still believe that."

The rat, holding a sign that read, "New York Immigrants Against Rocker!" was provided by Local 78 of the Asbestos, Lead and Hazardous Waste Laborers union, which had it nearby for another protest. The rat, which cost $8,000, has appeared in front of several businesses in New York in the past year.

Rocker, razzed by Mets and Yankees fans during the pennant race and postseason last year, told Sports Illustrated in December he would never play for a New York team because he didn't want to ride a subway train "next to some queer with AIDS." He also mocked foreigners and called a Latin teammate a "fat monkey."

Selig responded Jan. 31 by suspending him for all 45 days of spring training and the first 28 days of the season, fining him $20,000 and ordering sensitivity training. The players' association, which has been successful at overturning or shortening many suspensions, then filed a grievance.

Bill Fugazy, chairman of the National Ethnic Coalition of Organizations Foundation and a close friend of New York Yankees owner George Steinbrenner, called on Das to deny the appeal.

"At a time when Rocker should be showing all possible remorse for his words and actions, he shows no regret and that he has no regard for anyone but himself," Fugazy said. "His appeal clearly demonstrates that he has no concept of what he has done wrong."

Under baseball's rules, the commissioner's office puts on its defense first, then the union calls its witness. Howard Ganz, who is representing owners in their litigation with umpires, was the lead lawyer for management.

Meanwhile, trade rumors have surfaced involving Rocker, but no deal appeared imminent. Among the possible trades mentioned was one involving Seattle, which is trying to deal Ken Griffey Jr.

Mariners general manager Pat

Gillick wouldn't comment on the reports.

"The Chicago White Sox are not interested in obtaining pitcher John Rocker," White Sox owner Jerry Reinsdorf said in a statement. "We have spent a great deal of time over the last two seasons developing a roster of young players who care about the Chicago community and care about our fans. We believe that character counts in building a championship baseball team our fans can support."

Group emphasizes community

By NEAL MANGELS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A sustainable community is what a Manhattan organization would like to see accomplished. Members of Sustainable Manhattan view sustainability as a three-legged stool. Society, environment and economy are the legs holding the stool up. Each leg depends on the others to maintain sustainability.

"For a civilization to be successful, you have to have a balance," Bruce Snead, co-director and city commissioner, said.

Carol Peak, co-director and city commissioner, said the group started meeting about five years ago as a discussion group to educate each other. The organization grew from there.

"We brought other people in and formed an adviser group that was a broad representation of the community," Peak said.

"We have vastly differing opinions in the group, but we are all concerned about clean water, clean air and the world we live in."

Snead said an important project they have been working on which is establishing indicators. The indicators will serve as a gauge for sustainability for the future.

"We are trying to find ways to measure a community's quality of life," Snead said.

Sustainable Manhattan has worked hard on informing public policy, and Peak said they feel good about the city's growth policy.

"We don't advocate for a specific policy," Snead said. "We ask hard questions to help people get to the heart of the issues."

David Macfarland is active in the organization and said the group has done a good job raising questions about growth.

"We have raised questions about the standard thinking about growth — that growth is always a good thing," Macfarland said. "In some cases it is and some cases it's not. We have begun to help more people imagine situations in which growth might not be desirable."

One of the missions of Sustainable Manhattan is to educate the public. They sponsor a variety of UFM roundtable discussions and classes that promote sustainability.

Snead said Sustainable Manhattan has done a lot to raise the concept and importance of sustainability in Manhattan and is recognized statewide.

The organization is viewed as a model for other communities interested in sustainability.

"We are recognized as leaders in the state of Kansas," Snead said.

Sustainable Manhattan is concerned with the future of the Manhattan area and they try to think in terms of five generations out, Peak said.

"We are focused on Manhattan. But Manhattan is not an island, and we cannot exist alone," she said.

Federal aid cannot keep up with costs

By ANJETTA MCQUEEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Senators complained to university officials Wednesday that more federal student loans and aid seem to be enticing colleges to raise their tuitions, and students and government cannot keep up.

"It is incumbent on us to take a serious look at the effect of this government spending on tuition rates," said Sen. Fred Thompson, R-Tenn., chairman of the Government Affairs Committee.

Tuitions at public and private schools overall have doubled in the past 20 years, after inflation, making college unaffordable for many families despite the $41 billion in annual federal grants and guaranteed loans, Thompson said.

Senators said they fear more federal aid simply could drive up college costs even more, speculating that states could raise public tuition caps — figuring more students could afford it because of a larger loan, a higher grant or a potential tax break on their bill.

Senators also said private schools might reduce their campus-based programs in favor of students who can afford to pay their own way with the help of federal loans and tax deductions.

College officials denied Wednesday that they were driving up tuition costs to take advantage of increases in federal aid and said there's little government can do to control costs.

"Tuition price controls will not work and will be destructive of academic quality in higher education," said William Trout, president of Rhodes College in Memphis, Tenn.

"It's hard to believe that parents would welcome a decision by the federal government to curtail severely their access to loan capital," said David Breneman, an education school dean at the University of Virginia.

Soaring price tags can be blamed on a handful of the most expensive private schools catering to students who don't need aid, said Harvard economist Caroline Hoxby.

"There is no evidence that students are being forced to enroll in inexpensive colleges that are inappropriate for their level of preparedness," said Hoxby, pointing out that Education Department data also shows that since 1970, tuition at the least-expensive schools actually has dropped 15 percent.

CPR training offered to students

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Knowing survival skills sometimes can mean the difference between life and death.

Students will have the opportunity to learn a few of these skills and become certified during a first-aid and CPR training session Feb. 19. The session is sponsored by the Union Program Council's Outdoor Adventures Committee.

"You never know what kind of situation you'll be put in," said Gina Kimble, program adviser for the committee. "It's important to learn survival skills."

She said the session first was experienced by committee members.

"We primarily did it to benefit ourselves to be prepared for trips but then realized there was a greater need on campus, so we opened it up for the whole campus," Kimble said.

The session is offered once every fall and spring, with 12 slots available. Those who participate learn different life-saving techniques through the use of a first-aid and CPR book, dummies and each other.

For the CPR training, participants will read along with their instructor out of their book and then practice what they learn on a dummy. They will learn techniques used not only for saving adults, but for children and infants as well.

The first-aid training will include watching a video and reading from the training book. Students then will take that knowledge and practice.

"You practice on other students," Bonnie Sperslage, committee member, said. "You practice putting on splints and stopping bleeding by elevation and pressure points."

Participants also will learn how to assess an emergency situation, how to treat shock to check for a pulse.

The session costs $22 if the participant has the training book and $32 if they are in need of it. Training will be from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Certification for the CPR is valid for one year, while the first-aid training certification is for three.

Sperslage said these are important survival skills to know because of the possibility that an emergency situation always could occur.

"You never know when you'll need to use it, you could come up upon an accident or be in a restaurant and someone could be choking," Sperslage said.

Conversation Starters

Hearts most popular candy during Valentine's Day holiday season

STORY BY ERIN SCHNEWEIS

ON THE WEB

More info is available at www.necco.com.

If they were placed back to back they would extend 1 million miles, could go back and forth to the moon twice or around the world 40 times.

Conversation hearts.

The New England Confectionary Company, a primary manufacturer of the popular Valentine candy, has rolled more than 250 billion conversation hearts off their production lines.

Diana Havenstein, manager of Mr. Bulky's in the Manhattan Town Center, said there are two different kinds of conversation hearts: the original flavor and a new, sweeter kind. She said the candy, known for its greetings, are available with almost any phrase imaginable.

"I haven't seen anyone scoop through them to find certain words," Havenstein said.

Just in case, the staff at Mr. Bulky's is equipped with latex gloves to find certain phrases, Havenstein said.

The traditional conversation hearts read, "Be Mine" and "I'm Yours." With the changing of society, Havenstein said they have hearts that say, "Fax Me," "Awesome" and even "Get Lost."

The candy is popular among people of all ages, and both genders buy conversation hearts, Havenstein said.

"It's pretty much across the board," she said.

Jason Budinas, assistant grocery manager at Dillons, located on Sarber Lane, said there is a variety of candy to choose from. He said the store stocks all kinds of valentine gifts, including conversation hearts.

"We have everything you could possibly imagine," Budinas said.

Budinas said conversation hearts are some of most popular candies the store sells during the season. He said the conversation hearts are especially popular for elementary children because there is a greeting card on the back of the individual-sized packages.

Brad Lickteig, junior in management information systems, agreed with Budinas on the average consumers of conversation hearts.

"It is cute for grade schoolers but not for teenagers and adults," Lickteig said.

This love candy hasn't always been on tiny hearts. According to NECCO's Web site, prior to World War I they were made in the various shapes such as postcards, watches, baseballs and horseshoes.

Anyone can create a greeting to have printed on the candies, and NECCO can custom print conversation hearts if a full production run is purchased. One run produces 3,500 pounds, which results in 1.6 million hearts.

Dillons ordered eight pallets of Valentine's candy for the holiday, including conversation hearts.

Budinas said even though that seems like a lot, it is less than what is ordered for Halloween or Easter. For Halloween, the store ordered $80,000 worth of candy, where only $10,000 worth was ordered for Valentine's.

Not just around Valentine's Day, but all year, Jelly Belly beans and a variety of gummy candies are popular at Mr. Bulky's.

Other kinds of candy that Mr. Bulky's offers for the holiday of love is the Color Work of M&Ms, where you can choose between 21 colors from individual bins.

"We do a lot of the K-State colors, but for Valentine's we have hot pink, red, white and lavender for people to choose from," Havenstein said.

Mr. Bulky's offers a variety of balloons, candy and balloon bouquets, chocolates and stuffed animals. There is also a selection of quart jars mixed with candy or empty ones for customers to create their own. The store also has passion pills, which are popular, especially with college students, Havenstein said.

Budinas said the Dillons' floral department has more to offer than their candy selection.

Havenstein said she would prefer custom orders to be made before Feb. 12, but she will have the store staffed for those last-minute shoppers on the actual holiday.

"We are happy to help anyone at any time," Havenstein said.

Supping savory Valentine foods does not have to be expensive

By LINDSEY FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

This Cupid's day, some couples and friends will relax in the shadows of fine foods and spirits in the comfort of their homes.

Of course, price is an important factor for anyone not on an expense account. If you and a significant other are planning to dine-in this holiday, or you are throwing a Valentine's day gala, there are plenty of optional ways to save a buck or two.

Dinner parties can become expensive, but Chef Julian Serrano of Las Vegas' Picasso restaurant has come up with a dinner-party menu that would feed up to 100 people for only $100. His basic ingredients can be found in the February issue of Food & Wine magazine. Serrano's recipe calls for canned tuna, plain white button mushrooms and a few other ingredients. The contents of the magazine are helpful for dinner preparation, presentation and finding delicious bargain wines.

Serving wine can help presentation during a meal, according to the book "Life with Wine: A Practical Guide to the Basics." Wine, in addition to a meal, can spark romance and adventure.

The book, written by wine connoisseur Dick Patton, is a practical guide to the basics of wine tasting and food pairing. It mentions that when serving fish and chicken, stick to a basic white wine and red wine with meat. Also if you serve more than one wine, it is best to serve white before red, light before heavier, and dry before sweet.

Before celebrating the occasion, Debbie Sicard, assistant manager of Mr. P's Party Outlet, suggests decorating the dinner table.

"People have been buying our centerpiece sprays," Sicard said. "They look a lot like tinsel but stronger, and they branch out like a tree."

Mr. P's sells heart-printed napkins and plates, special Valentine's Day goodies bags for 10 cents and balloon bouquets for $10. Sicard said several customers have purchased heart-shaped tin pans with intentions of making a cheesecake and having it conveniently delivered to their homes.

All of these ideas are focused around a college budget, but if you still can't fit the bill for dinner at home, the www.food.com Web site would like to give you a "great big chocolate-covered smooch." The Web site is giving away a romantic dinner or trip for two. If you log-on and sign up, you have the chance to win one of 12 dinners delivered to your home or a trip for two to the Commander's Palace in New Orleans.

Valentines Day Delicacies

Betsy Barrett, assistant professor of hotel/restaurant institution management and dietetics, of the Food Production Management class developed a few Valentine's Day menus that are inexpensive and easy to make. The class also suggested decorations to create an atmosphere or interesting topic of discussion while lingering at the table.

Menus

1. Spinach salad with raspberry vinaigrette dressing chicken breast marinated in Italian dressing over bed of long grain rice (garnished with fresh lemon and parsley) steamed sugar snap peas garlic bread
strawberry shortcake.
2. Caesar salad
mesquite grilled chicken breast garlic mashed potatoes green beans with almond slivers in a butter sauce whole wheat rolls
choice of: strawberry vanilla ice cream with heart-shaped sugar cookies or cherry swirl cheesecake.
3. Tossed greens with lemon caper vinaigrette grilled salmon with honey bourbon glaze couscous steamed buttered asparagus with roasted cherry tomatoes warm buttered rolls double chocolate mousse with fresh glazed raspberries.
4. Fresh apples, strawberries, pineapple and grapes in an orange/cinnamon sauce

- fettuccine alfredo with grilled chicken steamed fresh broccoli
French bread seasoned with garlic butter tiramisu (served with two spoons, to share with your loved one).
5. Field greens sprinkled with southwest seasoning and served with ranch dressing southwest seasoned grilled or baked chicken breast rice pilaf (packaged) sauteed squash zucchini and red bell peppers
garlic bread
Sara Lee frozen cheesecake with chocolate sauce.

Decorations

White tablecloth covered with flower petals or confetti
Silverware in white napkins with red ribbon tied around the middle.
Candles for natural light or small bowls with floating heart candles.
Card at each setting that says, "Five things I really like about you," and ask the people sitting at the table to complete the list and give it to their valentines during dinner.

senators who hit those niche spots," Maxwell said. "Honestly, people fight over minority candidates, trying to win the African-American vote or the Hispanic vote."

The system does put a lot of weight on the presidential candidate, he said.

"But if the student body presidential candidate is smart, he will recruit a good core of people to run, and that core has to include a large multicultural contingent," he said.

Maxwell said KU had a 21-percent voter turnout last year, which he said partly is due to the coalition system.

While Maxwell has tried to get Heinrich to change K-State's system, Heinrich said he has been trying to get Maxwell to make KU's system like K-State's.

"I really think ours is more representative of a cross section of campus," he said. "When you get a coalition like that, everybody thinks the same way. There's really no difference of opinion on issues."

"I don't really think it serves the purpose of a legislative body. You want people who have differences of opinion who can debate the issues instead of just rubberstamping something."

Heinrich said he feels good about the way SGA has tried to interact with underrepresented groups, and he said he hopes the student body will see an increase in multicultural students running this year.

Prieto said SGA is going to have to make multicultural representation a top priority before K-State sees any changes.

"Unless we take some action and hold people responsible and accountable for getting up there and having people have access to those type of positions, it's going to stay the same," he said. "We've got to have some change."

These crystals have unique properties.

The materials are active adsorbents, which means the particles can take large amounts of chemicals onto their surfaces.

"They can adsorb toxic chemicals, which can be important when you're concerned with chemical attack," Sherwood said.

The materials could be used in things like gas masks, Sherwood said.

He said he had no exact figures, but the nanomaterials could be much more effective than the traditional carbon filters.

The grants were announced by the defense department Monday, but the university has not received official paperwork, including the exact amount of the grant.

The defense department awarded $40.2 million to 100 academic institutions.

The competition was steep, said Betsy Holahan, press secretary for Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan.

The defense department awarded only 221 out of 700 applications. Roberts is a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The equipment to be purchased with the grant money included two spectrometers and a thermogravimetric analyzer.

The spectrometers use ultraviolet or infrared light to measure characteristics of particles.

The analyzer uses heat to observe changes in materials. Sherwood said other researchers, including himself, will be able to use the new equipment.

at the University of North Carolina School of Medicine state that no adverse economic affects existed in five North Carolina counties that instituted a ban in restaurants.

"Statistics show that there have been no significant economic loss for bars where the smokers have to go outside," he said.

Carpenter, though, cites statistics from nine studies in areas including New York, Boston and Oklahoma that showed the opposite.

"In California, I've heard it hasn't had an effect on businesses, and I've heard of places that have," he said. "But people should be careful about which statistical data they pay attention to."

KHRA, which lobbies against a ban on smoking in public facilities, doesn't take a position either for or against smoking. Carpenter said the owner should be able to determine policies regarding smoking so as to appeal to the customers.

Greg Finn, owner of the Gin Mill Lounge, said he thinks a ban on smoking wouldn't be popular in bars.

"I think it would be a problem trying to keep people from smoking in bars," he said. "That's what people do in bars. Whether people smoke any where else, they come to bars and they smoke. Drinking and smoking go hand in hand."

Matthew Whiteley, freshman in animal science, is a Lawndale, Calif. resident, where smoking is outlawed in bars.

"I have no preference, but a lot of my friends don't smoke, and they enjoy going to the bars there," he said. "A lot of non-smoking bars get more business because those who can't stand the smoking are more willing to go out."

Cooper said when it comes to a ban on smoking, Kansas and California are very different.

"In California, you can smoke outside year round. You can't here," he said. "In every bar that I have been to, the majority of the people are smoking. You don't go to a bar to be healthy."

"I think it is a scary proposition to send a resolution to the city saying that the student body wants smoking banned in public places, when the majority of the students who go to Aggieville don't agree."

REPRESENT

public more," Mark Oppel, student body vice president, said.

The University of Missouri's Senate has special seats for certain multicultural groups on campus, but it is in the process of restructuring its Senate, Susan Manuel, Missouri Student Association president, said.

MU's new plan will include three minority seats and one black/greek system seat.

"Having multicultural seats is a huge issue at our school and is taken very seriously when trying to form a new, stronger Senate," Manuel said.

While race relations is an issue at Baylor University, Jon Rolph, student body president, said minority representation never has been a marquee issue there. He said Baylor's Student Senate has a variety of minorities serving the students through government.

Parisa Fatehi, University of Texas student body president, said UT doesn't have multicultural seats in its Senate either, but it does have committees and agencies that address other things. UT's student government did have a Minority Information center, but it got so big that it became its own center on campus.

Fatehi said diversity becomes part of the discussion of everything, but it's not a big deal in terms of representation.

Texas A&M student body president Will Hurd said multicultural representation isn't really an issue in A&M's student government, either.

"We try to do a good job in making sure all students are heard," he said.

Douglas Jeffrey IV, Texas Tech University's student body president, said it doesn't have special seats because Texas Tech's Student Senate doesn't think a multicultural student only can be represented by another multicultural student.

"If you allow one culture a certain seat, then you open up the spectrum of where do you draw the line," he said.

Student government representatives from the University of Nebraska, Oklahoma University and Colorado University could not be reached.

Defense witness testimony backfires in Diallo murder

By TOM HAYS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALBANY, N.Y. — The first eyewitness to take the stand in the Amadou Diallo murder case backfired on the defense Wednesday when she testified that police officers continued to shoot the unarmed black immigrant after he had fallen to the ground.

Defense attorneys had called Schirre Elliott to the stand in the hope her testimony would support the officers' contention they believed Diallo had pulled a gun.

On cross-examination, Elliott said she watched from across the street as four plainclothes New York City police officers cornered Diallo and opened fire.

"They continued shooting while (Diallo) was down?" prosecutor Donald Levin asked.

"Yes," Elliott replied, breaking into tears.

Elliott said she saw the shooting as she walked home from the subway after midnight in the Bronx last February. She described the officers jumping out of a car with their guns drawn, forming a semi-circle on the sidewalk outside Diallo's door and opening fire.

The testimony prompted defense attorneys to ask Justice Joseph Teresi to declare Elliott a hostile witness.

The judge agreed to let them cross-examine her about her account later.

Elliott emerged as the trial's first eyewitness to the shooting after the defense subpoenaed her to testify on behalf of Officers Kenneth Boss, 28, Sean Carroll, 36, Edward McMellon, 27, and Richard Murphy, 27.

The officers, all white, are charged with murder and could get 25 years to life in prison.

Contact with hijackers breaks down

By CAROLINE BYRNE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

STANSTED, England — Contact with the hijackers of an Afghan airliner broke down Wednesday after the flight crew escaped, but police regained communication and expressed confidence they were on track to win release of the 150-plus hostages aboard.

The negotiations became strained after four crew members staged a daring midnight escape through a cockpit window. Police were left to wonder if anyone aboard could fly the Ariana airlines Boeing 727 if the hijackers chose to take off again. The plane had leapfrogged across Asia and Europe before arriving at Stansted airport near London early Monday.

"You can imagine their (the captors) reactions when they discovered that the flight crew had gone," said Joe Edwards, an assistant chief constable of Essex County police. "Perhaps, understandably, things went quiet."

Contact resumed later Wednesday and negotiators grew more hopeful about the release of the 150-plus hostages.

"We're more optimistic now," Edwards said. "Negotiations are where they should be."

Negotiators insisted that the armed men had made no formal demands, political or otherwise.

The men, believed to be Afghan dissidents armed with grenades, pistols and daggers, had requested only that food, water and other comfort items be brought to the plane, parked on a runway.

Speculation mounted in the British media, however, that the plane was seized as part of an elaborate bid for political asylum — and that some of the hostages were in on it.

"HI-HOAX? Hijackers and hostages may be asylum seekers," the tabloid Mirror blared on its front page. The downmarket Daily Star lamented "Oh no! They ALL want to stay (and we'll have to pay)."

Fueling the asylum speculation was the arrival Tuesday of an observer from the office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. The observer would be providing expertise but would not be joining the negotiating team, Edwards said. The commission's London office identified the observer as Hope Hanlan.

It was believed that 151 people, including 21 children, remained aboard the aircraft, which was hijacked early Sunday 20 minutes into a domestic flight leaving Kabul, Afghanistan's capital.

Among them were 39 members of one family who were traveling to a wedding in Mazar-e-Sharif — including the would-be bride, said Mohammed Daoud Sharisi, who sells tickets at the Ariana office in Kabul.

Early in the day, the hijackers ejected a flight attendant, who was seen being sent forcibly down a set of stairs at the rear of the plane.

His departure came four hours after four crew members — the captain, second captain, first officer and flight engineer — escaped by using a rope to lower themselves from the cockpit and jumping onto the tarmac.

"What we are not able to determine is whether any of the remaining crew on board or any of the passengers are able to fly this aircraft," said John Broughton, an assistant chief constable of Essex County police.

Four men, presumed to be hijackers, appeared briefly on the ground at the rear of the plane Wednesday morning to collect fresh supplies. That evening, two men descended the jet's rear steps and collected an evening meal — a result of the continuing negotiations. They appeared to carry out an inspection of the aircraft.

Wichita Boeing workers might follow Seattle's lead

By ROXANA HEGEMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — Contract negotiators for engineers at Boeing Inc.'s plant in Wichita say there is a good possibility its members will join their striking Seattle colleagues.

The negotiating team probably will decide late Wednesday whether to recommend its 1,200 workers walk off the job, said Jim Singletary, contract administrator for Society of Professional Engineering Employees in Aerospace in Wichita.

"There is a good possibility we may have to make our point, but the negotiating team will ask the membership to support that and get a vote," he said.

The local union negotiating team plans to meet late Wednesday to work on its strategy and coordinate with its Seattle office, Singletary said.

He expected the team to decide then whether to recommend a strike at the Wichita plant. It could be as long as two weeks before a strike vote is put before union members in Wichita.

SPEEA, Boeing's second-largest union, represents about 22,000 engineers, scientists, manual writers, computer software designers and technicians in Washington, Kansas, Florida, California, Oregon, Texas and Utah. About 13,000 are actual union members.

The company's Wichita engineers work under a completely separate contract than engineers in Seattle, said Dick Ziegler, spokesman for Boeing in Wichita. The Wichita engineers have been working without a contract since Feb. 2.

Singletary said it has been two months since union negotiators last asked Wichita members whether they wanted to strike.

"We will see what the level of interest is down here — that could be in the next couple of weeks," he said.

Engineers and technicians walked off the job Wednesday at Boeing's Seattle plant after last-ditch talks with a federal mediator failed to produce an agreement on a labor contract.

Talks between Boeing and the union had been overseen by C. Richard Barnes, director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service.

Negotiations broke off Tuesday night, and no new talks are scheduled.

"We don't know what the effect is going to be yet (in Wichita),"

Singletary said of developments in Seattle. "We are still trying to get them to make a contract offer down here."

No workers walked off the job Wednesday at the company's Wichita plant, Ziegler said.

It is too early to tell what effect the Seattle strike will have on operations in Wichita, Ziegler said. Most of the parts used here either come or are made in Wichita, and then the airplanes are shipped to Seattle for final assembly.

"In a strike situation, nobody wins," Ziegler said. "Wages lost by strikers are never regained. Production lost by the company is never regained."

He declined to discuss the company's contingency plans for a strike.

"As far as we know, no strike is planned in Wichita at this time," Ziegler said. "We have and continue to meet with our local union folks informally."

He acknowledged there are rumors of a strike at the Wichita plant but said the company would likely hear about it first, even if just informally, from its union representatives.

"These folks are truly ladies and gentlemen about it," he said. "Business is business."

Strip mall proposal to return to commission

Property owners' feelings mixed

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's a blessing for some business and home owners and a curse to others who make their homes in the area under consideration for strip-mall development in Manhattan.

The five-block area houses residential, commercial and industrial zones. It includes convenience stores, fast food restaurants, houses and specialty businesses.

Ron Fehr, interim city manager, said several things have to happen before the area could become a strip mall. He said the ideal situation would be the developer buying the properties directly from land owners. Otherwise the city could attempt to purchase the land itself, with appointed appraisers to judge the fair market value of the property, he said.

As a last resort, the city could invoke eminent domain and condemn the property for the public good, reimbursing the owner according to appraisals. Either party could appeal the price, and the case could be settled about 90 days from the time it is filed.

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As the Tuesday meeting of the Manhattan City Commission approaches, it is anyone's guess what a Chicago-based developer will bring to the table.

At the Jan. 18 meeting, the commission agreed to hear further plans from representatives from First National Development Ltd., a Chicago-based group interested in acquiring and redeveloping a 34-35 acre tract of land near the Manhattan Town Center.

The group will speak to the commission at the Tuesday meeting and possibly begin formal agreements with the city.

Ron Fehr, interim city manager, said the city has been in informal contact with First National since December. The city's Jan. 18 resolution holds no obligation but allows the firm to proceed with a more concrete proposal, he said.

The proposal First National submitted at the January meeting involved converting a section on the east side of Manhattan into a shopping center with as many as 30 different business tenants.

Demetrios Dellaportas, consultant for First National, said the developer almost certainly would send a representative for the next meeting but might not have a formal presentation. For now, he said, the company wants to invite participation in the plan from individuals and businesses.

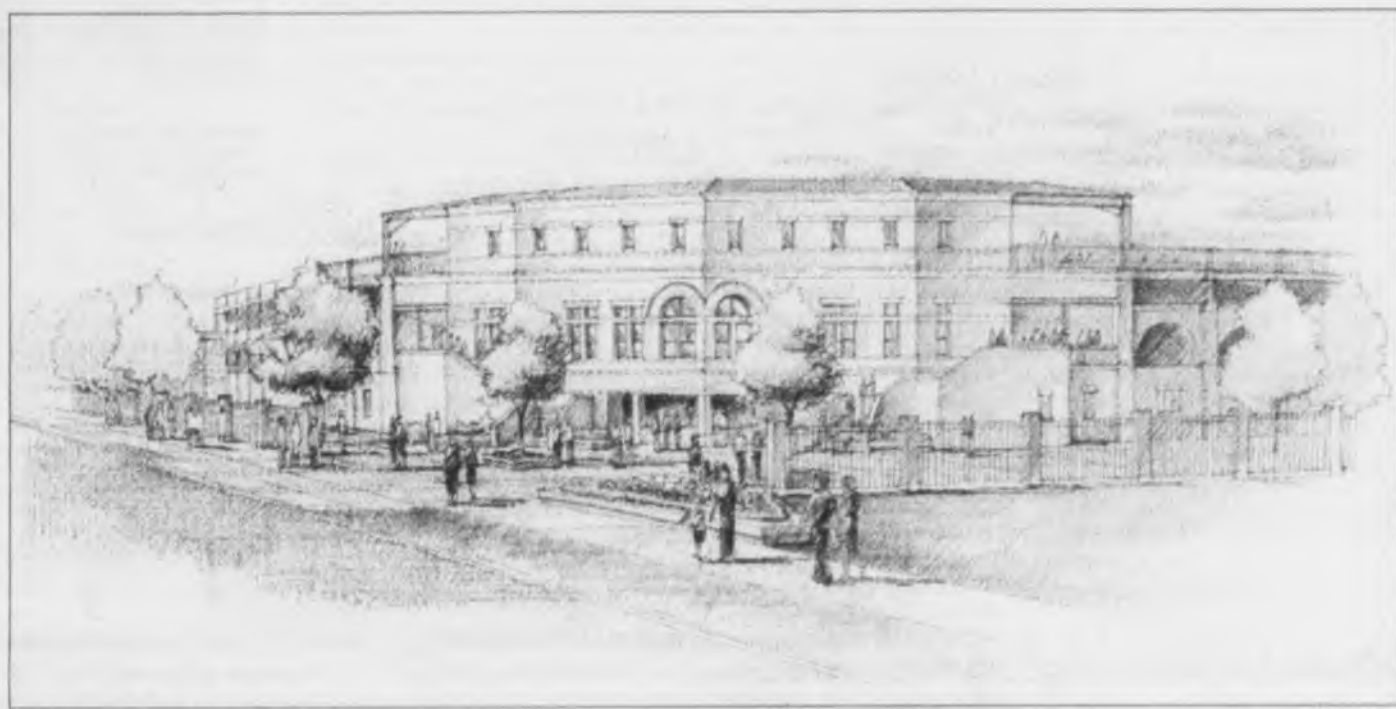

"Otherwise, it would be very difficult to proceed," he said. "There are no secrets here."

Dellaportas said he could not not specify interested tenants for the center, but said the firm hopes to use the majority of the area proposed.

Baseball stadium on schedule for April completion

The new Frank Myers Field is a work in progress, and phase one will be completed in April.

The stadium's playing surface is completely finished, Jeff Steele, assistant athletic director, said. Steele said he is encouraged by the stadium's progress.

"It is going well. I am pleased with where we are right now," Steele said. "The field is in excellent shape right now. We are just putting home plate down."

The Cats can come home after playing most of last season with a satellite home field and every game on the road. K-State now will be able to play its home games in a stadium that remains under construction.

However, off the field the stadium remains unfinished. Temporary seats are being brought in for the home opener on Saturday against Doane.

"Phase one of the project should be completed by April," Steele said.

K-State assistant Sports Information director Tom Gilbert said Phase One includes the playing surface, both team dugouts and a seating bowl.

Steele said that while the stadium seating bowl still is being constructed, it will have temporary seating.

"We have installed about 500 seats along the left field line," Steele said.

The second phase of the project should be completed by the end of the summer or in time for next season, Gilbert said.

Phase two will include suites, a new press facility and player locker rooms complete with laundry and sports medicine facilities and concession areas.

However, not all areas of phase two are likely to be completed on time. Aspects of phase two, such as the weight room and coaches office, are expected to be completed prior to the 2001 season, but Steele said this segment will be dependent on fundraising and donations.

The department is still lacking the funds to complete all of the plans for the stadium, and Steele didn't have an exact figure on what it would cost.

"We don't have a finished price tag on what it is going to take to do this phase," Steele said. "But I think it would be about a million and a half to get it all completed."

K-State baseball coach Mike Clark said the stadium will rank amongst the best in the Big 12 Conference once everything is in place.

"It's going to be a beautiful, phenomenal facility," Clark said. "We'll just have to be patient for a little while. When this thing is all done, it's going to be as nice as anybody has in the country."

Man arrested for stabbing

By GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan resident was arrested Wednesday for the attempted murder of his girlfriend.

Stephen W. Keirse, 31, was arrested after police found Debra A. Doenges, 41, in her home at 520 Osage St., Apt. 8, with multiple stab wounds, said Detective Connie Miller of Riley County Police Department.

Police reported to Doenges' home after a 911 call from her residence in which a female described the victim as attacked and bleeding severely.

Doenges suffered from two stab wounds to the back, three to the chest and abdominal areas and two lacerations to her face with one more large laceration on her neck, police said.

The victim was brought to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue by ambulance for treatment of her wounds.

A supervisor from the hospital was unable to disclose any information on the condition of the patient, but the press release from RCPD said Doenges was stable and in good condition.

RCPD had previous knowledge of the relationship between the two before the stabbing, Miller said. Keirse was arrested for a probation violation from Riley County after a domestic-abuse charge with Doenges as the victim in October 1998.

The couple has a child who was not present during the attack.

After the accident, the suspect was found at 1204 Yuma St., Apt. 3, a home of an acquaintance, arresting officer Lance Luftman, said.

"Keirse was brought in for questioning then subsequently arrested," Miller said. "Currently, he is incarcerated in Riley County Jail with bond set at $100,000 for attempted murder."

Bond for probation violation was $750, bringing the total to $100,750.

Police are investigating further.

Senate approves smoking proposal

By JENNIFER GIER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate adopted a resolution that would support the city if it chose to stop smoking in public places Thursday night. Rick Wooten, a smoker and bartender at the Aggie Lounge, said it should be up to individual bar owners whether smoking is allowed in their bars.

"If a bar owner wants to make his bar smoke-free, then it should be his choice," he said.

Student Body President Jason Heinrich said there are exemptions to the proposed ordinance. If a bar sells food, then it is considered a restaurant.

State legislation could raise faculty salaries, allow K-State to compete

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

April will bring an end to the 2000 session of the Kansas Legislature, and K-State officials are hopeful it also will bring an end to the debate over faculty salaries.

A proposal under discussion by legislators would provide $8.4 million to be distributed among Board of Regents institutions for teaching and research faculty, creating a 5.9-percent salary increase if passed.

However, whether this raise will be enough to allow K-State to be competitive when hiring and retaining faculty is not clear, said Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance.

"It may allow us to make some progress, but it depends on how the peer institutions work," Rawson said. "If the peer institutions raise their salaries by 6 or 8 percent, we're going to lose ground."

K-State's five peer institutions, Colorado State University, Iowa State University, Oklahoma State University, Oregon State University and North Carolina State University, consistently offer higher faculty salaries, said Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president of administration and finance.

"We're at 12 percent below average among the peer schools," Schellhardt said. "We also rank 12th in the Big12, and of the 46 land-grant institutions, we're 41st in terms of faculty salary and benefits."

Budget Office director John Struve said he agreed that peer institutions tended to be a step ahead of K-State when it came to salary raises.

Even if the 5.9-percent increase is approved by the end of the legislative session, salaries among the peer schools could change at any time, Struve said.

"It's a moving target problem," he said. "Typically, the peer institutions move a little faster than we do."

The danger behind lagging salaries lies in unhappy K-State faculty on the lookout for better opportunities beyond Manhattan, said Marion Gray, Faculty Senate president.

"What I really want to stress is that this isn't faculty whining for more money," Gray said. "It damages the institution when faculty are always looking for another job and wanting to get away from here."

Gray said that even if this legislation is passed, the raise would not be enough for faculty members.

However, Gray also said he wondered how the 5.9-percent increase proposal would fare after coming under fire from conservative republicans in the Legislature this week.

Even if the legislation under deliberation is passed, its results will not be known for quite some time, Rawson said.

"We won't know the full effect of the proposal until about a year or so from now, so we won't know how our salaries are relative to our peers for a while," he said.

Another issue that should be addressed quickly is that of operating costs for departments and colleges within K-State, Gray said.

"Our operating expense budget is only at 60 percent of those of our peers," he said. "We're just as concerned about running our offices and getting curriculum materials and lab supplies."

Schellhardt said he agreed that operating costs were a problem, but an end to this particular issue was nowhere in sight.

"For every $1 that a peer institution gets, we get about 57 cents. We would need another $750 per student per year to reach the peer level," he said. "We asked for 3.5 percent as part of the Board of Regents request to the governor, but we won't see any increase in operating support."

HUD provides grants to fund gun buyback program in K.C.

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development has provided grants to help fund a gun buy-back program in Kansas City, Kan.

The $12,900 grant will be coupled with $30,000 from the city housing authority's Drug Elimination Grant funding, which is also provided by HUD. The housing authority also hopes to raise 10 percent of the total funding from the private sector, bringing the total to $47,190.

The Drug Elimination Grant money has helped with a variety of safety projects around HUD and low-income properties, as well as providing drug-prevention activities for youths.

Marc Marciano, administrative coordinator with the housing authority, said the group would like for the guns to come from neighborhoods where public housing exists, but the program won't be limited to those neighborhoods.

The authority plans to reward participants with vouchers instead of money.

"We don't want to buy guns with cash," Marciano said. "What we want to do is negotiate with grocery stores, department stores and any other stores that want to participate and issue vouchers valued at $50."

The dates of the program have not yet been determined.

Almost all guns collected through the program will be destroyed. The guns will be checked to make sure they have not been reported stolen or used in the commission of a crime. Collectible and antique guns will be sold to collectors to help fund the effort.

WSU Student Senate calls for recall of its president

WICHITA — The embattled student president at Wichita State University is fighting to keep his job amid allegations he improperly used a food stamp card to buy food for a campus fund-raiser.

The university's Student Government Association received a petition at Wednesday's student senate meeting calling for the recall of student body President J. Alberto Fregoso.

The latest move comes one week after the Senate overwhelmingly voted to demand Fregoso's immediate resignation.

Fregoso, who is contesting the legality of the petition before the WSU Supreme Court, has said in the past he will not resign.

He did not immediately return a telephone call Thursday from The Associated Press for comment.

A recall election will be held Feb. 21 and 22 to let WSU students decide whether Fregoso should be removed from office, SGA Treasurer Ryan Martin said.

Fregoso, 29, has been accused of buying food for an SGA fund-raiser with his family's food stamps, then having the SGA reimburse him for those purchases.

Fregoso also allegedly drove a state vehicle to Topeka for a meeting during the summer, at a time when his driver's license was suspended.

Fregoso receives $8,580 as a state employee for his year-long term as SGA president, which ends June 30.

A father of four, Fregoso has attended Wichita State since summer 1997.

View of Trump's new course enjoyed by nearby inmates

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — The best view of Donald Trump's new $40 million golf course might be from the county jail, where the inmates are said to be directing catcalls and jeers at women golfers.

The fee to join Trump International Golf Club is $300,000, but the view is free of charge for inmates at the Palm Beach County Jail. Their cells and outdoor recreation areas are just a short iron drive away from the third hole of Trump's new course.

The inmates have dubbed their quarters The Breakers Inn, bragging to friends on the outside about high-rise life on the country club's beautiful greens.

Recently, columns in the local newspapers have been filled with talk about how the inmates yell at the female golfers.

This week, Trump ordered more towering palm trees planted along the land that separates the jail and the recently opened 18-hole course. But he said the trees were not planted in response to complaints from the club's 200 or so members.

"We have never even had a complaint from our members, and our members are extremely rich and extremely spoiled," Trump said Thursday. "You can't even see the jail from the course. It only comes into play on one hole, and that's on the third hole. You don't hear it."

Football award. Another year and another bowl trophy.

The K-State football team will be presented with its bowl trophy from the Culligan Holiday Bowl during halftime of Saturday's men's basketball game, which pits K-State against the University of Kansas.

The players also will be available on the concourse at 1:30 p.m. to sign autographs.

On Sunday, the weekend will be capped off with a honors and awards ceremony at McCain Auditorium. K-State head coach Bill Snyder said he is looking forward to seeing K-State students and faculty at the ceremony.

"I would really like to see our student fans attend," Snyder said. "It is a special evening and one they would really enjoy. I just want them to experience the magnitude and excitement and emotions of this evening."

Trailer troubles. Some days crime just doesn't pay. Just ask a 34-year-old Wichita man who allegedly stole a trailer, then tried to sell it back to its owner.

Authorities say the man went to an auction in Wichita on Tuesday and said he wanted to buy a trailer that was for sale.

He then stole it under the pretext that he wanted to take it on a road test, said Maj. Gary Steed of the Sedgwick County Sheriff's Department.

While driving around, the man decided he probably could sell the trailer to a nearby business that he figured would be interested in it, Steed said.

But when the business owner came out to look at it, he recognized it as his own.

"That is my trailer," the owner told him, and then called 911.

The suspect ended up wrecking his vehicle and was arrested by the sheriff's department.

Presenter performs skits depicting black leaders' struggles, successes

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One man expressed the lives of eight different black leaders through acting, singing, changing costumes and characters.

Phillip E. Walker, the sole performer during Thursday night's performance "Can I Speak for You, Brother?", began each skit by asking to speak for one of the leaders.

Each skit depicted an aspect of that leader's life and beliefs.

Beginning the first skit, he asked to speak for the slave. He depicted the life of a slave through the use of poetry.

Unlike a usual poetry recital, he acted this one out, demonstrating the treatment of slaves through intense feelings.

Walking up and down the aisles in the Union Main Ballroom and interacting with the audience, he performed the second skit, "High John da Conqueror." It was a comical skit about a slave named John and the relationship he had with his master.

Portraying all characters, he showed how the master tried to control John's behavior with threats. John was the conqueror in the end by using his wits, not physical force.

"The Discussion Goes On" portrayed the life of Frederick Douglass, who spoke on slavery after the Civil War.

"Born as a slaved black man, he picked up freedom and ran," Walker said. "He used his speech and language and got the other slaves freedom."

He spoke of how the discussion of race would go on as long as inequality was prevalent in society.

In memory of Martin Luther King Jr., he sang a song addressing King's dream, his life and his love for all people.

"He was compassionate of all men regardless of color of skin," Walker sang. "He had a dream of peace."

"Martin, your name will never be forgotten."

Tying a tourniquet around his arm, he depicted the drug addiction of Malcom X. He demonstrated how Malcom X fought off his addiction and discovered how the passion in his father lived in him.

In his final skit, "Spirit Flight Into the Coming," Walker spoke of work in life and its importance.

"Model all that is good and accomplished in the world, and take work. Work is what we need the most of," Walker said.

He ended the speech by a calling for new leaders.

"If I speak for you, brother, and make your history known, then the future is yours," Walker said. "Come leader, be known."

Walker said he began performing because he wanted to pay something back to the community that had given him so much.

"I felt I had to pay something back," he said. "You have to be careful with the gifts you get — to give a lot back."

The performance originated as a two-week production, but due to its popularity it still is running 22 years later.

"I think it was good how he acted things out. It really grabbed your attention instead of just making a speech," Tom Reynolds, sophomore in physics, said. "The way he walked around made you feel like a part of it."

Walker said he hoped his performance inspired people to learn about the black culture.

"I hope to encourage people to learn about this history because it's not taught in school," he said. "They have to be inspired to learn it."

Phillip E. Walker performs in the African American Drama Company's "Can I Speak for You, Brother?" in the Union Main Ballroom on Thursday evening. The play was a one-man show depicting black leaders.

Telefund raises funds from alumni support

By SARAH SOURK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Enthusiasm, chocolate, 80 telephones and fun — this is the scene of KSU Foundation Telefund 2000 in the Hollis Telefund Center.

Telefund director Gordon Dowell said the Telefund is a way for alumni to return their enthusiasm in the form of a financial gift.

Dowell has been with the Foundation for 15 years and has helped with the Telefund off and on during that time.

Dowell said when he came to K-State in 1985, the total amount of money raised that year was $338,000.

The Telefund has raised $615,800. They have set a goal of 1.2 million to reach by Feb. 29. Dowell said the College of Engineering has raised $265,604, the most so far.

Feb. 9 was another record-setting evening, Dowell said. The colleges of Business Administration and Education broke their current records and celebrated with Nestle Crunch bars.

Nestle donated 1,034 pounds of chocolate and gives out chocolate when records are broken. Dowell said the chocolate seems to act as an incentive.

"The Telefund is all volunteer — it is the world's largest all-volunteer telephone campaign for higher education," Dowell said.

He said K-State calls for one month and has wonderful alumni support — ranking third in the Big 12 Conference for percentage of alumni supporting their alma mater.

Dowell said students arrive around 6:00 p.m. for a short training session and then start calling from 6:30 until 10:00 p.m.

"So many things have to happen and everyone has to do their part, it is a positive learning experience," he said.

Every year the Telefund sets records in either the number of donors or amount of money, Dowell said.

"It really says a lot about the education received and the accomplishments of the K-State alumni," he said.

The Telefund is supported by many businesses, perhaps the most notable this year is Wichita Big Wheels, which donated a car to be given away through a random drawing. Wichita Big Wheels wanted to recognize students with leadership and participation, Dowell said.

Brandi Crum, junior in elementary education and pre-child psychology, said she was surprised by the fun atmosphere of the Telefund.

"It was my first time, I didn't know what to expect," Crum said.

Crum had a busy night and was able to get 30 pledges. Crum said it was fun to hear the alumni get excited when receiving a call from a cur

Benjamin Krutzkamp, senior in marketing, also enjoyed his first experience helping with the Telefund. Krutzkamp said he was never really aware of the Telefund before, but definitely would do it again.

"It actually was a lot of fun," Krutzkamp said.

Krutzkamp won many prizes for the 12 pledges he acquired for the fund-raising effort.

"I got a large pizza, free Bi Mac, candy bars, drinks and chips," Krutzkamp said.

Dowell said the Telefund wouldn't be possible without the help of dedicated alumni, motivated students and tremendous support from the business community.

The Telefund is online this year, which gives alumni the option to give donations over the Internet. College totals are updated nightly and a live camera captures the action in the Hollis Telefund Center as students raise money for their colleges.

Women should be encouraged in sciences

More than half of K-State students are women. Only 14 percent of engineering majors at K-State are women.

When young girls are growing up, most are thrust into traditional female gender roles. They play with dolls and have tea parties.

As they progress through school, rarely does a teacher step from the norms and urge young girls to pursue scientific and mathematic curricula.

Aside from traditional gender roles, there is no real reason for this. No substantial evidence has yet been collected that suggests any differences in the spatial abilities of males and females.

Because women have long been relegated to careers that focus more on the arts — or on homemaking — the myth has lived on that men are more apt in math and science. Now is a perfect time to leave this myth in the past.

Teachers should encourage girls at young ages to travel down paths toward male-dominated fields.

Women can, as well as men, become engineers, doctors or anything else they want.

Likewise, men can become nurses, writers or homemakers. They simply need to be encouraged to pursue what interests them — starting in grade school and continuing through high school and into college.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

We have entered the 21st century. It is time to realize men and women have the abilities to do most everything equally.

To ensure that men and women continue to have equal capacities, teachers need to begin to teach equally.

Parents, teachers and friends need to encourage equally.

When this happens, women will be able to step into roles they have been unable to assume for no other reason than tradition has prevented it.

nice guys finish LAST

Jerks, perverts force women to be overly cautious even of honest, well-meaning men

During fall 1999, 60 women at K-State were brought together not by personal choice, but by an unwanted outside source.

These women were each terrorized by "Matt," the e-mail bomber, who repeatedly sent them unwanted, sexually explicit messages through the Unix system.

Although these young ladies were untouched, they would not be unchanged. Thanks to a few perverts like this, a cloud of doubt and suspicion looms high above the entire male population. Unfortunately, the nice guys are the ones to endure the weight of this burden, which usually results in knowing countless women who just rather would be friends and many lonely Friday nights. Meanwhile the jerks, perverts and chauvinists are free to run about gallivanting as much as they please, thus allowing them to continue in their already destructive ways.

These same jerks, perverts and chauvinists are the guys who are looking for relationships that will only provide them with some sort of personal gain, whether it be power or sex. This barbaric attitude is why some guys choose to treat their girlfriends no better than they would a dog and why others see them as nothing more than something to score with. Thanks to the existence of this barbaric attitude, men are still seen as nothing more than Neanderthals in the eyes of most women. Unfortunately this label is then applied unilaterally to include all men, even the "nice" guys who are only guilty of being men.

Complicating the situation even further are the overly cautious young women who are the unfortunate products of fear. These women are afraid, and rightly so, they might be the next to fall victim to one of our society's dangerous sexual predators, just as countless women have before them.

Sexual predators are everywhere, even here in Manhattan, and they do not wear a sign saying, "I am a predator." As a result, these young women are forced to watch over their shoulders and continually remind themselves it's better to be safe than sorry.

A nice guy would never slip GHB or any other date-rape drug into a woman's drink; they would not try to get a cheap feel as a woman walked by; and they certainly would not engage in hollow flirting. Despite this, the better-safe-than-sorry attitude of many women is just another problem that nice guys must face. The problem is that nice guys typically do not like to approach women who do not appear to be at all interested in men, which just happens to be one of the biggest defense mechanisms used by women these days. Don't get me wrong. They do realize that some women use this strategy. However, they would rather not play Russian roulette and accidentally find a woman who is actually not interested in men.

Another problem that nice guys face is the fact that they are just that, nice guys. Their peers, the jerks and chauvinists, often ridicule them for not knowing how to take advantage of life's little and not-so-little pleasures.

On the other hand, most women would never dream of dating a so-called nice guy — obviously in favor of the more exciting jerks — but they would want him around as a good friend.

Ladies, let me tell you a thing or two about nice guys. We are not all virgins and we are not all fanatically Christian. Most of us do not wear thick-rimmed glasses or a pocket protector; in fact, we buy our clothes from the same places as everyone else, including the exciting jerks. We don't just study all of the time; we do have social lives, too.

We are by no means perfect and we do not claim to be (We're just close, that's all). Don't forget we are human and do enjoy life's little pleasures just as much as anyone else.

We do have one major difference from all of the other guys out there though, and that is we were brought up to get more out of life than just an easy score.

Collegian gave unfair commentary of Senate

Editor,

The concerns expressed in "Our View" Thursday regarding Student Senate and representation are laudable. Your portrayal of Student Senate, however, is not.

As I read the column, I was shocked at the misrepresentations — bordering on lies — that were scattered throughout. These misrepresentations need to be addressed.

Regarding Senate's response to Heath Schroeder's presentation, you wrote, "Rather than heed his concerns, senators mocked and ridiculed him. Not only was this treatment of a constituent whom they are supposed to represent blatantly disrespectful and totally uncalled for, it is also an example of ignoring a valid complaint."

As the recording officer for Senate, it is my responsibility to summarize open period presentations such as Schroeder's — as well as the senators' questions. While many senators had questions for Schroeder, some of which were probing, at no point was he mocked or ridiculed. Mocking and ridiculing are prohibited by Senate decorum, and the chair would have put an end to both if they had occurred.

Senators asked questions because they too, were concerned with Schroeder's findings. If they had not had questions, perhaps you would have found them guilty of ignoring Schroeder or being disinterested.

As for ignoring a valid complaint, perhaps your reporter missed the announcement by the chair of the Operations Committee at the last Senate meeting that the committee would be looking into Schroeder's concerns. In fact, we did just that at our meeting Monday, at which, I might note, no Collegian representative was present.

The committee chair presented an informal survey of Big 12 institutions he had conducted regarding Schroeder's concerns, and these were discussed.

We will be continuing to research this issue, because issues of concern to students like Schroeder are issues of concern to us.

You do your readers a great disservice by inaccurate reporting and unfair commentary. Student Senate is working to address the concerns of students like Schroeder, and having to respond to shoddy journalism does not facilitate the process. I don't ask for an apology — what I do ask is that you, like Senate, start looking to serve the best interests of the students.

Thursday issue coverage deserves commendation

Editor,

I would just like to congratulate the Collegian staff for the excellent work you did on Thursday's edition.

It is not often that so many quality articles appear in a single newspaper. Not only was there good reporting of national and local news, sports, and coverage of campus news, but there also was impressive research by Angela Kistner and Frank Flaton regarding student issues — diversity and smoking.

Most importantly, I think the editorial board was professional and informative in its editorial concerning student representation in Student Senate. They were able state an opinion without personal attacks or bias. This is a rare accomplishment.

Keep up the outstanding reporting, and I hope to see more publications like this in the future.

People should respect others' religious beliefs

Editor,

After reading Jeff Elliott's column on God in Tuesday's paper, and then reading the letters published Thursday, I felt compelled to write. I wish the two men who wrote would open their eyes to the world around them. Elliott was truthful and honest in his opinion (after all, that is his job, right?), and all they can do is bash it. Why is it that anytime a person writes about God and his truth, people feel the need to tear down the author?

Again, Elliott is not forcing anything on anyone — he simply stated his opinion. However, it can be noted that, had one written about any other religion, no one would have said much of anything.

This goes out to all the Christians, too. Why are we, as brothers and sisters in Christ, not speaking out in support of people like Elliott and Scott Roney who are only trying to share God's love?

We all need to consider the fact that different people have different opinions. If the men who wrote want to write their opinions, they need to get a job at the Collegian. As humans, we are all different and that is what makes us special.

Why is it so difficult to accept that fact? I ask you and your readers to seriously consider where you stand with what you believe and what you put your trust in. Are you secure enough with yourself to pour out the truth of what you believe to your peers?

Elliott and Roney sure are, why doesn't anyone else?

Citizens' rights include choice of what to read

Editor,

In response to Eric Castaneda's letter in Thursday's Collegian, I must say that, as an active member of our Armed Forces, I am offended when a person states they are "tired of reading these columns every week."

Castaneda says this institution is beholden to federal statutes and the First Amendment. I guess I am unfamiliar with the federal statute that states an American citizen cannot express his or her opinion in a public column, whether it pertains to religion or not.

In fact, Castaneda is correct in saying we are "beholden to ... the First Amendment" in that it was our Founding Fathers' intent that people have the right to freedom of expression. There have been many times I have read columns in the Collegian I didn't agree with, but I know it was my choice to read them.

Thousands of people throughout the history of this nation have spilled their blood not only so people could write articles on things such as religion, but so people like you can say you believe we shouldn't have that right. That's the bitter-sweetness of our freedom of speech.

In the future, Castaneda, if you see an item on the opinion page you think you might find offensive, don't read it.

Greek councils vote down motion to terminate Homecoming bidding

By SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A motion to end the bidding process for fraternity and sorority Homecoming pairings was not passed Thursday by councils of greek representatives, composed mostly of chapter presidents and Homecoming chairs.

While there was some thought that bidding would be replaced with a random pairing process, Mary Schwartz, Panhellenic Homecoming chair, said it was merely speculation.

The change that was adopted includes more limitations on how often houses can be paired together. Fraternities will have a two-year rule, meaning that no fraternity can be paired with the same fraternity two consecutive years, Schwartz said.

Once that pair is decided, they cannot be paired with a sorority that either house has participated in Homecoming with for the past four years.

Fraternities and sororities now operate under a three-year courtesy rule. The change will make the rules mandatory, instead of only courtesy, Schwartz said.

To ease into the change, this year fraternities can pair with sororities they have not done Homecoming with in the past two years, Schwartz said.

Fraternities and sororities voted as separate councils by secret ballots Thursday night. Each council had to pass the motion by a majority vote for it to go into effect, Mike Goodpasture, Interfraternity Council president, said.

"There were a couple of motions that got passed by one council and not another," he said.

Megan Evans, Alpha Chi Omega president, said the support for certain motions was uneven.

"There was definitely more support for sororities to do it at random," she said.

She attributed the decision to not change to random pairings to people, particularly fraternity members, wanting to decide pairings themselves.

"People just wanted the right to choose," she said. "There was a feeling for that on the sorority side, too."

The issue initially was looked into after a letter outlining a proposal to change the system was sent to Greek Affairs adviser Barb Robel last summer, Schwartz said.

"That sort of got the ball rolling, and we've gone from there," she said.

Changes were made to the bidding process last year, Schwartz said. Time restrictions were the most visible change. Bidding now can occur only between 5 p.m. and 11 p.m., which eliminated possibilities like giving rides to potential partners. If a house is bid by two groups, the two have to split time evenly.

It is hoped the changes made will improve K-State's Homecoming and the greek community, Evans said.

"Who knows what will happen right now?" she said. "I want to say things will be improved, but you never know what will happen with Homecoming."

"I hope it will lessen the hard feelings that happen sometimes. I think it will be a good change."

Agriculture Sen. Matthew Wolters opposed the resolution because he said people who go to bars aren't worried about their health.

"I'm not a smoker, yet I take the risk when I go to the bar," he said.

Eckert said, however, no one should have the right to affect someone else negatively.

In other Senate news, the Senate unanimously adopted a resolution supporting less paper use on campus.

The firm will need to present more plans to proceed, Fehr said, particularly acquisition plans and relocation plans. Unlike a field or a vacant lot, the area under discussion is a zoning mix of small businesses, industry and houses.

If First National representatives can satisfy those concerns, they might be able to leave the meeting with an agreement guaranteeing the city will work exclusively with First National on the project, Fehr said.

"Ideally, the developer could reach an agreement with the property owners," he said.

However, Commissioner Carol

Peak said she'd like to see more details in the developer's proposal.

"I think they need to bring out expectations," she said. "I don't want to be kept in the dark."

Peak said she has a particular interest in revitalizing downtown Manhattan instead of leaving it to save itself or allowing development to flourish on the outskirts of town.

"What I'm hoping for is a development that will blend with downtown," she said. "I want to see if we can find a way to move people back to Poyntz."

One of her priorities is making sure the people displaced are treated fairly. She said the construction of the mall in the mid 1980s was a similar situation of moving people in the name of redevelopment. Peak said the developers and the city will need to communicate with everyone who has a stake in the project.

"I think we've got to be as inclusive as possible," she said.

Ockert Fourie, senior planner with Manhattan, said the city's ongoing Downtown Tomorrow plan identified that area for redevelopment. Tax increment financing and helping traffic flow at the Blumont Avenue and Tuttle Creek Boulevard intersection were suggested as incentives, he said, since developers would need to clear existing development to begin work.

"I think, historically, that is one of the difficulties working with older areas of town," he said.

OWNERS

Fehr said.

For now, Fehr said owners simply have wanted to be kept informed, and he has advised them not to stop renting property in anticipation of a deal that might or might not go through. Developers would have to buy the leases out anyway, he said.

"I've been telling people to keep doing what they've been doing," he said.

Some land owners in the area haven't kept doing business as usual, however. There was speculation that Manhattan Steel and Pipe Supply Co. has entered a tentative agreement with First National Development Ltd. Manhattan Steel and Pipe is the largest land owner in the area with more than $927,000 in land holdings, according to city data.

Dennis Mullin, president of Manhattan Steel and Pipe, confirmed the company has a contract but did not name the partner, citing a confidentiality agreement.

Ruth Schrum said that if Manhattan Steel and Pipe wants to sell, that's fine, she just wants the same right.

Schrum and her husband own four buildings in the area and they gave one on Poyntz Avenue up more than a decade ago when the mall was constructed. She said the eminent domain system abuses owners.

"If you don't like their appraised price, they'll condemn it and take you to court," she said. "Is it for the public good to get more places to shop? That has never been my definition of eminent domain."

In addition, homeowners or renters will be displaced, she said. The area First National is looking at is affordable housing for people, she said, and it would be very difficult to find new houses if they leave the area.

Harry Baxter rents out a building on North Third Street, which is within the proposal area, and he said he supports the idea.

"I think it's great. I think the concept's right," he said. "I'm kind of in favor of a strip mall."

Baxter said the existing mall doesn't offer enough as a regional shopping center, but a strip mall designed to fit in with the area could give the downtown area a boost.

"In practicality, the downtown is a good strip mall," he said.

As far as reimbursement for his property goes, Baxter said he has dealt with local appraisers in the past and has been satisfied.

"That part I'm not worried about," he said.

Newell Vathauer, the owner of Newell's Barber Shop, said he is worried, though.

His shop sits just outside the discussed area, but he said he remembers how he was moved from his Poyntz Avenue shop when the mall came in.

The plan was to move into the mall when it finished, he said, but the rent was too high to do it.

"They gave me money for my building, but they didn't give me a damn thing for my business," he said.

smoker, spoke to senators during open period. She said she would support the city in a clean-air ordinance.

"I don't want to walk into someone's cloud of smoke," she said.

Spencer said she probably would come to the bars if smoking was eliminated.

She also said 87 percent of lung cancer comes from tobacco.

One concern of several senators was the economic consequences of eliminating smoke in the bars.

Jared Rose, arts and sciences senator, said some bars could be hurt by the resolution.

"It's hard to operate a successful bar," he said.

If non smokers really wanted to press the issue, he said, they should boycott bars.

"Don't go for one month. Organize a boycott," he said. "We need to make a compromise and this is the way to go."

He said that if the ordinance is going to produce profits, he didn't know why the bars weren't already banning smoking.

However, Governmental Relations Chair Travis Lenkner said he could think of one possible reason bars had not become smoke-free before now.

"They're not going to be the first person to stick their neck out, because they're afraid they'll lose money," he said.

Student Body Vice President Gabe Eckert said the issue of clean air should not be an economic issue, but a health issue.

Heinrich said he agreed.

"Society divides up responsibilities," he said. "The responsibility falls on other agencies to protect the public health."

He also said the issue is about protecting people's rights.

"When you smoke, you are infringing on someone else's rights," he said.

Cats fight to break streak of 16 losses against Hawks

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two teams in the midst of losing streaks will meet Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State (8-13 overall, 1-9 Big 12) will face long time, intra-state rival No. 20/18 Kansas (17-6, 6-3) at 3:01 p.m. in the 245th meeting between the two schools.

The Wildcats are in the midst of a nine game losing skid, a streak that originated in a 87-79 loss to the Jayhawks in Allen Fieldhouse on Jan. 12.

Meanwhile, Kansas has lost four consecutive road games for the first time since 1988-89, Roy Williams' first season as Jayhawk head coach. The Hawks are looking to avoid losing five straight games for the first time since the 1982-83 season.

"They're going to be extremely focused coming in here, I guarantee you," senior forward Josh Reid said. "They're kind of searching for some answers right now, I think."

While the Hawks will try to halt one streak, they'll try to preserve another. Kansas has won 16 consecutive meetings between the two teams in Manhattan, including all 11 meetings in Bramlage Coliseum.

The Hawks also have won the past 17 games overall against K-State. The last time K-State defeated Kansas was a 68-64 victory over the top-ranked Hawks in Lawrence on Jan. 17, 1994.

K-State head coach Tom Asbury said Saturday's game is going to be a special one for his team.

"We don't talk a lot about it, but we don't have to talk about it — it's just a given, it's an assumption," Asbury said. "It's special in the sense that they're your intrastate rival, and it's special in the sense that they're always a nationally ranked, great team."

Reid, who is from Brewster, Kan., agreed that it is an important game for the Cats, although some of his teammates aren't Kansas natives.

"I think for the most part they kind of know, because KU has been such a powerhouse throughout the years," Reid said. "I think one of the reasons guys come to K-State and the Big 12 Conference is to just to play against teams like KU."

"I don't know if (my teammates) know as much about the rivalry, but once in a while I tell those guys how important it is, especially with me being from Kansas."

This season, the Hawks' up-tempo offense leads the Big 12 Conference in scoring, averaging 81.7 points per contest. The Hawks also rank first in rebound margin (9.9) and blocked shots with 5.52 blocked shots per game.

"It's important for us to get off to a good start," Asbury said. "I don't think this game is any different than any other."

Kansas is led by junior Kenny Gregory, who is averaging 13.5 points per game and who is one of 30 midseason candidates for the John Wooden Award.

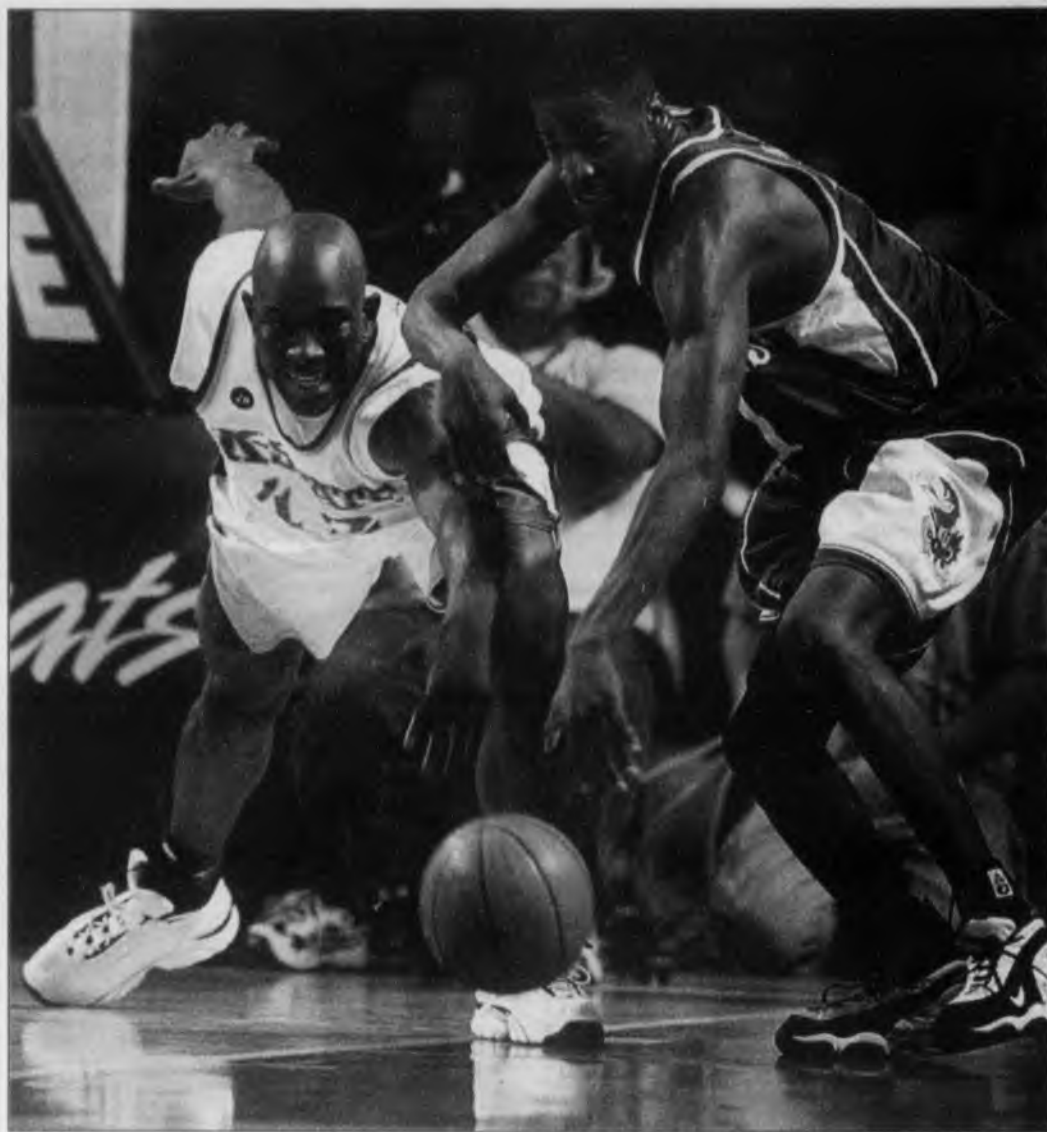

Freshmen Drew Gooden and Nick Collison also are averaging double-figures for the Hawks. Gooden leads the team with 7.2 rebounds per game, and both he and Collison are candidates for Big 12 Freshman of the Year this season.

Junior center Eric Chenoweth dominated inside against the Cats earlier this year, setting season-highs after scoring 22 points and grabbing 17 rebounds.

Sophomore point guard Jeff Boschee, averaging 9.8 points per game, provides deadly range from beyond the arc, averaging 43.1 percent from downtown.

K-State hopes to match the Hawks perimeter shooting with senior Cortez Groves and junior Galen Morrison, who have combined for 108 three-point field goals this season.

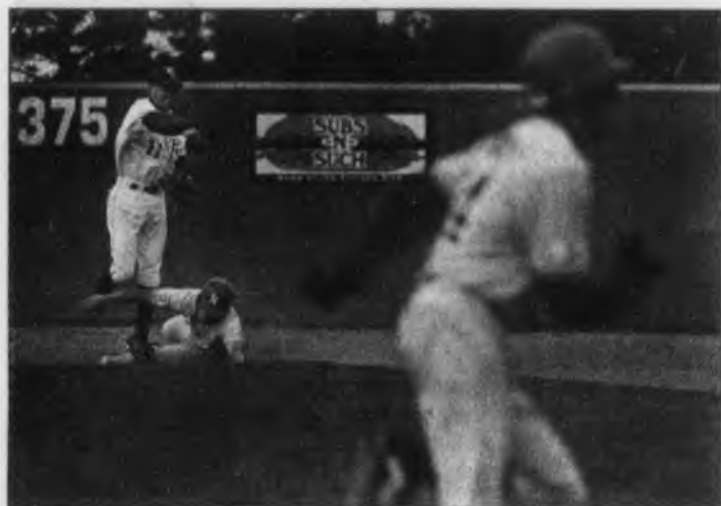

However, the Hawks will miss the services of 6-foot-10-inch junior

Women bring home win over Cowgirls, look to Iowa State

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pure relief. That's the feelings of the K-State women's basketball team (10-13, 3-7) its 71-64 win over Oklahoma State on Wednesday night.

"I can remember the last thing was the buzzer went off, and Nicky (Ramage) and I looked at each other and were like, 'finally,' senior forward Angie Finkes said. "It felt so good to win. It was almost like we'd forgotten what it felt like to win, because we had lost so many times."

"It was like a load off your shoulders," Finkes said.

In its first win in the past six games, K-State corrected nearly every problem that had caused the five-game losing streak, including the failure to put teams away in the waning minutes of the ballgames. However, in Stillwater, the Cats finished the game with a 10-3 run after the Cowgirls had evened the score at 61-61 with 4:25 remaining.

K-State's ability to dominate in the closing stretches of the game was due to the Cats' handling of Oklahoma State's inevitable runs.

"They made one or two offensive plays, and they made some baskets, and I think our defense adjusted really well," Finkes said. "But even when they made those baskets, we came down and made baskets. Every time they made a basket we answered."

Now that K-State has finally gotten a win, it makes it easier to focus on the upcoming game against Iowa State (18-3, 9-1), head coach Deb Patterson said.

"It felt so good to win. It was almost like we'd forgotten what it felt like to win, because we had lost so many times. It was like a load off your shoulders."

A JOURNEY ENDS

all them the "road warriors" no more. After 44 of 55 games outside of Manhattan and more than 17,000 miles roaming the Midwest last season, the K-State baseball team can drop its self-given nickname when the Wildcats (2-1) return home to the newly renovated Frank Myers Field to face Doane College at noon Saturday and 1 p.m. Sunday.

The field was supposed to be complete for the beginning of the 1999 season, but due to funding problems, construction was delayed, and the Wildcats were forced to play "home" games at sites such as Wichita, Salina, Hutchinson and St. Joseph, Mo.

When first informed of what would become their situation, many players didn't know how to take it.

"It was real tough for us to handle at the beginning," junior left fielder Kasey Weishaar said. "It took a toll on our sleep and our bodies until everyone got used to it and realized that was what we were going to do for the whole season."

Senior pitcher Jason Wells said there were moments of frustration.

"There were some moments when people got fed up with the exhaustion of travel and balancing school," Wells said. "But the coaches always made a point to try and keep our heads up."

Part of the reason players were able to keep their spirits up was because of the promise that the stadium would be completed for the 2000 season. But during the journey last year, questions arose as to whether the stadium would ever be finished.

"It crossed our minds once or twice, it just seemed like every time it came up they would tell you a different thing," Weishaar said. "Sometimes there wasn't enough money or maybe the contractor didn't come through. At one point last year, everyone was like, 'this thing will never

"It benefits everyone."

That's the view of K-State baseball coach Mike Clark in regards to the renovation of Frank Myers Field. You really can't blame Clark for the optimism, either. After a 55-game road trip last season due to the stadium's $5 million renovation project, the reality of home-field advantage is a welcome relief for Clark's gypsy team, who played a schedule more akin to Rand MacNally in 1999.

With the Wildcats' nomadic nature now a thing of the past, a two-game series against Doane this weekend will mark the first time in 21 months K-State has called "the Frank" home.

Husker Invitational preps track team for indoor nationals

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Husker Invitational today and Saturday signals the homestretch of the indoor track and field season for K-State. The meet is one month away from indoor nationals, and it is an opportunity for athletes to compete against some of the best athletes in the country.

K-State head coach Cliff Rovelto said the meet is filled with solid competition.

"The meet is big for some individuals, but not necessarily the entire team," Rovelto said. "Collegiately, it is probably one of the better meets."

It is a meet that is highly competitive and has a high minimum mark. Still, Rovelto said he is looking for strong performances on both sides of the ball.

The meet will be a formidable task for the Wildcats, who will compete against Nebraska. The Huskers dominated the triangular meet between K-State and Abilene Christian last weekend, winning 14 events.

Senior thrower Anna Whitham said the meet is important to postseason preparation.

Whitham is progressing quite well in the weight and the shot. Last week she set a personal record in the weight throw of 64 feet, 7 inches.

"In terms of who is there, that is one of the biggest meets that there is for throwers," Whitham said.

ROAD

get done, we'll never have a whole field."

Coaches consistently told their players to take care of what was in their control, which was their play on the field. Thirty-one games into the season and in the middle of Big 12 Conference play, the players and coaches had a meeting to get things off of their chests.

It worked. After the meeting, which came during the series against Oklahoma State on April 2-4, the Wildcats finished the year 13-11, 26-29 overall, with seven of those losses by three runs or fewer.

After all that, K-State missed the eight-team, Big 12 Tournament at the end of conference play by a single game.

"It was real tough and it was hard to take, but we left everything on the field," Wells said. "We were proud that we made it respectable — we walked away with our heads up."

The players also capped last season by learning lessons they might not have been taught otherwise.

"Being around 32 guys pretty much every day for four months — it was like having 32 older or younger brothers," Weishaar said. "We had to learn how to get along with people."

Going through the ordeal also helped the players to savor the things they had took for granted.

"Just knowing that you aren't going to always have to live out of your suitcase," Weishaar said. "I can live without that."

Senior second baseman Chad Tabor said he was glad the travel schedule will be lightened this season.

"We're just glad we don't have to get on the bus mid-week and on the weekend and take off and be gone for five out of seven days like we were last year."

So, after perhaps the longest season in the 100 years of K-State baseball, the Cats will return to their new, albeit still unfinished, stomping grounds.

"It's exciting just because we haven't played in front of our fans for over a year," head coach Mike Clark said, "but also because it's not the same home field — this is a nice ball yard, it's something that we can take a lot of pride in."

Braves pitcher testifies at his hearing

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — John Rocker got the chance Thursday to explain his controversial comments, testifying on the second and final day of a hearing he hopes will lead to a reduction in his suspension.

The Atlanta Braves reliever, suspended by commissioner Bud Selig until May 1 and fined $20,000, was the primary witness called by the players' association, which hoped to convince arbitrator Shyam Das to overturn the penalty.

Das' decision is expected later this month.

"It will be no sooner than 10 days from now," management lawyer Rob Manfred said.

Braves pitchers and catchers are scheduled to report to spring training Feb. 17.

Former major league pitcher Scott Sanderson was the only other witness called by the union. He testified on the effects of shortened spring training.

"It's before the arbitration panel. There's nothing more I can say," union head Donald Fehr said.

"It was a very full day of testimony," Manfred said. "It was eight hours."

In contrast to Wednesday, the first day of the grievance hearing, there were few protesters on the sidewalk outside baseball's offices.

It's not all sunflower seeds and pine tar for the team, however. Outside of the new playing surface and dugouts for both teams, the rest of the expansion project remains ongoing. The foundation for the seating bowl that eventually will hold 2,500 fans has been set, but patrons will have to be content sitting in temporary bleachers until the bowl is completed.

As for locker rooms, a new press facility and a suite level, the wait continues. The athletic department has included these improvements in phase two of the project, expected to be completed prior to the 2001 season. In other words, the new stadium Clark was promised last season will continue to be only an artists' rendition for one more year. At this pace, the miniature golf course Clark is planning to build in Aggieville might be operational before Frank Myers Field can truly be considered "one of the finest stadiums in the Big 12 Conference."

Nothing could be more unfair for the Cats' 14-year skipper. Clark, the all-time winningest baseball coach at K-State, has endured all the delays and detours of stadium expansion with a positive outlook in the face of adversity. Last season's road-trip sentence would have been an easy excuse for Clark to lash out at the athletic department, but he handled each new challenge with class and a can-do spirit.

Now apply the same scenario to Coach Bill Snyder. If someone informed him that all of the football team's home games would have to played elsewhere due to the expansion of KSU Stadium, you can bet there would be hell to pay. After all, this is the man who threw a fit over what kind of butter his team was served a few years back.

Clark has more to be concerned with than margarine this season. Beyond overcoming a young pitching staff and attempting to improve on a ninth-place finish in the conference, adjusting to life in a semi-renovated stadium will be one of the team's biggest challenges.

Still, you'll hear no complaints from Clark. His criticism will be aimed solely at on-field dilemmas. What occurs off the field will remain just another challenge towards bettering K-State baseball.

"I think some of the doubts that you may have been caring about, when we are going to get this next step and this next hurdle behind us," Patterson said. "Those are gone now, and I think we can focus more on the task at hand."

Because of the looming matchup vs. No. 8-ranked Iowa State, the Cats will not be able to bask in the glory of winning for long. The Cyclones are coming off a big win of their own, gaining a share of the conference lead by defeating previously league-perfect Oklahoma.

Iowa State will enter the game leading the conference in most statistical categories and with two players, center Angie Welle and guard Stacy Frese, who dominate in all facets of the game.

The Cats, however, should be encouraged that they almost defeated the Cyclones on their home court earlier this season.

"We proved last time that we could play with them," Finkes said. "I think we can still play with them."

KANSAS

Luke Axtell due to a medical condition. He had been averaging 8.6 points per game on 39.2-percent shooting from three-point range. Axtell scored 14 points against the Cats in the season's earlier meeting.

Kansas is coming off its third-worst defeat in the program's history after falling 86-53 at Oklahoma State on Monday night. The Hawks hadn't lost by that margin since a 100-63 drubbing by Kentucky in the 1974-75 season.

Asbury is 0-18 lifetime against

Williams, and seniors never have experienced a win over the Hawks. Reid said a victory against Kansas would shed a new light on the entire season.

"It's been tough," Reid said. "I definitely want to get a win, but if it doesn't happen, then you've just got to move on. But I think we're going to be extremely focused, and I'm going to come and bring my 'A' game Saturday and be ready to play."

To our Friends and Colleagues at K-State and in the Manhattan Community

Thank you for the many expressions of kindness and sympathy you have shown us during our time

Victoria's Secret has Valentine treasures

By TARYN FORT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

These days Cupid is showing up in the form of sexy lingerie.

Valentine's Day is fast approaching, and ideas for gifts are popping up in advertisements all over town. Kristin Patton, Victoria's Secret co-manager at Manhattan Town Center, said the store offers a specialty line for the upcoming holiday.

"The special-occasion line is essentially a Valentine's Day line in the fact that most of the clothing is coming in reds and pinks," she said. "Some of the prints are also in correlation with a Valentine's theme."

Two product lines will be launched this week.

"One of the products is a new garden fragrance called 'Pretty in Pink,'" Patton said. "It comes in the form of creams and body splash. The other product line is strictly lingerie, and is being launched under the names of 'Desire' and 'Stretch Lace.'"

Patton said sales at Victoria's Secret have changed noticeably over the past two weeks.

"A gradual increase has been building, and we will probably see even more this week," she said. "A lot more men have been purchasing items and gift certificates. We even see many mothers in buying their daughters gifts. And, of course, women have been in buying things for themselves."

Since the store offers the special occasion lines at different times throughout the year, it is often common for shoppers to buy gift certificates that may be used any time.

"Sometimes people who come in to buy gifts simply cannot figure out what to buy," Patton said. "Gift certificates tend to come in very handy for those who are not the best at picking out something for someone else."

Although women are primarily the buyers at Victoria's Secret, Patton said men should not be intimidated to buy gifts for their girlfriends or wives.

"Men are frequent customers in the store," she said. "Especially at this time of the year. Everyone who works here does their best to make everyone who comes in to feel comfortable."

Victoria's Secret is not the only store at which Valentine's gifts may be purchased. Several stores in Manhattan offer Valentine's specials and ideas. Traditional gifts such as roses and candy are not the only way to go anymore.

Jennifer Murphy, junior in advertising, said originality in a gift is much appreciated.

"A simple gesture can mean more than something elaborate," she said. "I think that most people will appreciate the fact that someone thought of them and went out of their way to get them a gift."

Valentine's Day does not have to just be about giving gifts to a girlfriend or boyfriend. Family members and friends are also people whom one may buy a Valentine's gift for.

"Valentine's Day is also my mother's birthday, so I am going to spend some time with her," Spencer Jacobsen, Manhattan resident, said. "I will probably watch Oprah with her and buy some dinner."

Stress and fretting about what to buy can be avoided since Valentine's Day is not until next week. With the celebrated holiday of love still a few days away, it is not too late to buy that special someone a token of love.

Dustin Stone, sophomore in electrical engineering, gets some suggestions on selecting a Valentine's Day gift from Victoria's Secret saleswoman LaTrice Moore, junior in apparel and textile marketing.

Patricia's Undercover offers gifts for men, too

By TARYN FORT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lingerie is not just for women.

Patricia's Undercover in Aggieville is providing Valentine's Day clothing attire for either sex.

"We tell the men that come in to make sure and pick up a pair of our boxers for themselves," said Teresa Purvis, sales associate at Patricia's Undercover. "If nothing else, women tend to pick something up for their partner. There is no reason to be buying only for one person for a holiday such as Valentine's."

Sales also have increased in association with the upcoming holiday.

The lingerie and swimsuit shop has a noticeable increase in sales the week before Valentine's Day, said Patricia Yeager, owner of Patricia's Undercover.

"Generally speaking, women tend to buy about a week before the holiday," Yeager said. "Men start coming around about four days before. The weekend before is completely unpredictable but usually results in more than usual sales."

Previous Valentine's Days have produced satisfied customers for the store.

"My boyfriend bought me a beautiful red piece of lingerie last year from Patricia's Undercover," Tiffany Taylor, junior in social work, said. "It's nice because it's useful any time of the year, but means more coming on Valentine's Day."

Lingerie and other clothing items are available for the modest as well as the bold.

"We sell items that are a bit more sexy than items that are usually sold in the store," Yeager said. "Baby dolls are coming back and have been popular the past couple of years. We try to provide an interesting selection for the customer who is daring and the customer that is a bit more conservative."

Patricia's Undercover staff always takes an extra step with the male customers to help them feel comfortable while buying for their partners.

"It seems to work better if a sales associate works with a male one-on-one," Yeager said. "He feels more comfortable and probably ends up making a more logical purchase if he is not feeling hasty. And every male is different. Whether it be an older male or a college age male, their individual reactions to the store are as individual as a person can be. We just would like everyone to feel uninhibited."

Knowing sizes are what Yeager said is most important in preparing to shop for a loved one.

"The number one thing that helps us is to know a man or woman's size," Yeager said. "If nothing else, get us a height and weight estimate. The receiver will be much more pleased with a gift that fits and that does not have to be exchanged."

City needs soccer coaches

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan Parks and Recreation needs soccer coaches for the spring 2000 season.

Mike Buchanan, recreation supervisor, said the city has about 100 teams, and parents of children on these teams only have met about half of the coaching needs.

The teams range from first grade to eighth grade, and boys and girls are separate. Coaches are needed for all age groups.

Buchanan said he isn't looking for experts in soccer to coach the teams.

"They need to like to work with kids," he said. "They need to have an interest in the game, and they need to be committed to the time it takes."

A minimum of three hours a week is required, but Buchanan said he encourages coaches to spend three to six hours a week with their teams.

Buchanan said coaching a team not only helps the children, but it also is a good experience for the coaches.

"First of all, they're doing a terrific community service," he said. "I also think they'll get as much enjoyment out of it as the kids do."

"It can be very rewarding for a person to take a bunch of kids who don't know one another and watch them become a team."

Coaching also looks good on a résumé, Buchanan said. It's something he said he looks for when going through résumés.

Jenny Callahan, a volunteer coach and junior in public relations, said she has coached a soccer team for the past couple of years, and she's going to do it again this year.

Callahan said she saw an advertisement for coaches and thought it would be fun.

"It's really a good stress reliever," she said. "It's a lot of fun, and the girls are real appreciative."

Buchanan said he encourages students to coach together because it can be more fun that way.

Callahan said she has coached with friends from her residence hall floor and friends from her sorority house.

To sign up to be a coach or for more information, call 587-2757. The season runs from March 5 to May 14.

Students earn money as camp counselors

■ Summer jobs fun way to get away from home.

By SARAH MCCAFFREY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Summer camps might be the answer for K-State students hoping to take a break from the amber waves of grain.

Many camps are recruiting students from Midwestern universities to serve as summer camp counselors.

Working at these camps offers an opportunity for students to travel across the country and meet new people.

"We find that kids from the Midwest possess the work ethic, good attitude and a good sense of teamwork," said Kevin Nissen, assistant director at Friendly Pines Camp in Arizona.

Many students from K-State, University of Kansas and University of Missouri have worked at the camps in the past, he said.

Activities offered by the summer camps are extensive. The United Christian Youth Camp in Arizona offers such activities as swimming, horseback riding, team sports and a high ropes course.

Other camps, like Camp Vega for girls in Maine, offers activities ranging from archery to dance to water skiing and wind surfing. Students working as camp counselors are expected to help campers with these different activities.

Tracy Sage, freshman in public relations, worked at Rock Springs Camp in Junction City last summer and is applying for a counselor position at Camp Robindell in New Hampshire for this summer.

Sage got involved in summer camps because she wanted to get away from her hometown of Topeka and meet new people.

"I think it would be awesome to get away from school stresses and be that far away," she said.

Besides seeing the country, summer camps can provide students with many other opportunities.

Camp counselor positions can be a beneficial experience to students who are planning on pursuing a career involving children.

"For those that are interested in working with children, this would be a good opportunity," said Shelley Moulis, office manager at United Christian Youth Camp.

Sage said other benefits that can be gained from a counselor job include helping students decide on a major and meeting people who can help them in the future.

Another benefit is the personal growth and experiences that come with the responsibility of being in charge of a group of children.

"The opportunities I think it provides are opportunities for growth," Nissen said. "Most counselors realize that personal growth is the greatest benefit."

Spending a summer far away from parents and dull routines may sound like fun, but it is also a lot of hard work.

"You have to be a hard worker and really, really like kids," Sage said. "It's not for everyone. There's a lot of stress on counselors to get along with everyone and look like they're having a great time."

For students interested in working at a summer camp, the newspaper is a great place to start looking. Many camps reach their target audience by placing ads in college newspapers.

Online services can also be of assistance. Web sites such as www.campstaff.com place prospective counselors with camps they are qualified to work for.

Nissen said working as a camp counselor offers many lasting memories.

"I think the rewards are something that lasts a lifetime," Nissen said.

Jazz Valentine

BY CLIF PALMBERG

Concert part of charity dinner

This Valentine's Day, students can give back to the community while treating their loved ones to a music-filled night.

The Manhattan Arts Center, with supervision from Dennis Wilson, assistant dean of arts and sciences, is sponsoring Jazz Valentine, a night of dining and music. Jazz Valentine will begin at 6 p.m. Monday at the Manhattan Country Club.

The evening will begin with dinner and will be followed by two jazz performances. D.W.Q., a local jazz ensemble, will open for Just Us, a jazz quartet from Kansas City, Mo.

Just Us consists of vocalist Angela Hagenbach and pianist Joe Cartwright. The duo, which formed in 1994, has released three albums and is nationally recognized. The U.S. Information Agency twice has chosen Hagenbach to be a Jazz Ambassador to the world.

"Jazz Valentine was born out of the K-State Jazz Festival," Wilson said. "It's a jazz lover's valentine. That's what I like to call it."

The event is a fund raiser for the Manhattan Arts Center. The money will be used to help the center sponsor various programs like educational programs, after-school programs, visual art classes and theater and dance scholarships.

Tickets for the dinner and concert are $60 without a center membership and $50 with a membership. To attend just the concert, tickets are $25 for non-members and $20 for members. Membership starts at $10.

For more information about Jazz Valentine or to make reservations, contact Grace Hwang at the center at 537-4420.

Local institute helps businesses meet environmental regulations

■ Pollution Prevention Institute gives free tips on handling, disposal.

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An institute located at K-State is designed to help small businesses and the Manhattan community stop generating waste before it becomes a problem.

The Pollution Prevention Institute was established in 1994 to help small businesses in Kansas come into compliance with state and national environmental regulations.

"We want to help the businesses focus on what the source of the pollution is, so they may be more efficient," Jean Waters, director of PPI, said. "The companies can then recognize their waste generation and work to comply with regulations by learning proper handling and disposal."

Waters said the help received from PPI is free, and the institute is nonregulatory and anonymous. She said anybody can call the toll-free phone number and ask questions without revealing their identity.

Specific names do not have to be reported, only statistics on how many phone calls received. An estimated 611 phone calls were made to PPI in 1999.

"People don't have to tell us who they are, and they can still ask questions," Waters said. "If people can tell us what the violations are without the fear of being written up, then we can help them with their problems."

Waters said most of the funding for PPI comes from a contract with the Kansas Department of Health and Environment. She said they also have contracts with the Environmental Protection Agency and the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

"We provide technical assistance so that we can find a technical solution to the problem," Waters said. "This is a confidential place where people can call and be open with us about their situation so we can find a solution."

Waters also said PPI assesses businesses on-site so they can find what potential environmental problems are and how the businesses can come into compliance.

Ryan Green, independent pollution prevention specialist for PPI, said he has been involved in key areas that have affected the environment of Kansas in the past couple of years.

One of the projects in which he assisted area businesses dealt with underground storage tanks. Between December 1988 and December 1998, businesses such as gas stations were mandated to come into compliance and upgrade storage tanks or be forced to shut down.

Green said toward the end of this 10-year period, he provided the community with information and made sure local gas stations knew what they needed to do to upgrade their systems. He said the services PPI provides to businesses and private individuals are a benefit to prevent future problems.

"We provide free services, and are nonregulatory so small businesses and home owners can call us with questions and not be afraid," Green said. "It gives people the means of finding information without the fear of repercussions."

Waters said PPI also helps with programs such as Home*A*Syst, which is a self-assessment program that is used to evaluate homes and property for pollution and health risks.

This program is coordinated in conjunction with county extension offices and the U.S. Department of Agriculture and is used to evaluate things such as septic tanks, storm runoff, household cleaning agents and waste, lead, asbestos and radon within private homes.

Green said the most important thing was to help businesses and individuals get back into compliance with regulations and to help them find the answers.

"We want to assist businesses and get them back into compliance with regulations," Green said. "Then we need to help them switch their systems to become more environmentally friendly so that everyone wins."

Hijack ends; asylum requests questioned

By GLENN MCKENZIE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

STANSTED, England — About half the hostages freed from a hijacked Afghan airliner requested asylum in Britain, but their 74 applications ran into immediate skepticism Thursday from officials who feared the four-day drama was all an elaborate bid to escape Afghanistan.

Police arrested 21 people as the standoff ended peacefully before sunrise Thursday.

At 3:50 a.m., about 85 captives — mostly women and 21 children — suddenly streamed down the aircraft's rear stairs, illuminated by bright lights, their flowing garments fluttering in the wind. The rest, including the hijackers, filed down the stairs two hours later.

Officials said the hijackers never asked for asylum, but many others on the flight did. Home Secretary Jack Straw told the House of Commons that Britain would try to deport them, subject to legal requirements.

"Clearly, you cannot have a situation where a signal can be sent to anybody that the way to get asylum is through hijacking a plane," he said.

The hijackers took over the Ariana airline flight early Sunday on what should have been less than an hour's flight from the Afghan capital of Kabul to the northern town of Mazar-e-Sharif.

The plane made stops in Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan and Russia, releasing 22 passengers. Ten more people were let go and four crew members escaped after the plane landed early Monday at Stansted airport, 25 miles northeast of London. That left 151 aboard.

Police gave no guarantees during the mostly calm and businesslike negotiations, said David Stevens, chief constable of Essex County police. The hijackers never gave a clear explanation of their aims, he said.

"It became clear in the last hour of the negotiations that they were expressing concern about the political situation in Afghanistan," he said. "For the first 75 hours, they didn't talk about the political situation at all."

Police recovered four handguns, five knives, one set of brass knuckles, two detonators and two grenades, though they did not appear to have fuses, Stevens said.

He anticipated a long process of interviewing all the people aboard the aircraft, mainly through translators, to build a case.

The hard-line Taliban government in Afghanistan sent a fax to British authorities thanking them for ending the hijacking safely. The Taliban's civil aviation minister, Akhtar Mohammed Manzoor, asked that the plane — one of only nine in the aging fleet — and its passengers be returned.

The hijackers "must be punished, otherwise it will be an example for others that they can hijack a plane and get asylum if that is what they want," Manzoor said. "It's not right that they should endanger all the passengers to get asylum."

Britain does not have diplomatic relations with Taliban authorities, who practice a strict brand of Islam and control 90 percent of Afghanistan.

Traveling choir pairs with Tallinn Chamber Orchestra to perform classical pieces

STORY BY JENNIFER LAKE

In keeping with the tradition of supplying quality entertainment, the McCain Performance Series will feature the Estonian Philharmonic Chamber Choir and Tallinn Chamber Orchestra at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

Created as a professional touring choir in 1981, the ensemble performs more than 100 concerts yearly. The Tallinn Chamber Orchestra, founded in 1993 by Tõnu Kaljuste, frequently collaborates with the choir for recordings and touring concerts.

Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain Performance Series, said the performance is a wonderful opportunity to hear one of the leading choral symphonies.

"There are fewer than 20 of these groups worldwide," Jackson said. "These musicians are the finest of the fine."

The group frequently perform the works of contemporary Estonian composer Arvo Pärt. They were nominated for a Grammy in 1995 for best choral performance in response to the recording of Pärt's "Te Deum."

Jackson said performing contemporary composers give an advantage to both the musicians and the composer.

"Historically, composers haven't received much recognition until after they have been dead for a long time," Jackson said. "The best part about Pärt is that he is talented and continues to grow. You don't have to be dead to be heard."

Kerby Lovallo, director of New World Classics and agency manager for EPCC, said this will be the group's third U.S. tour. When not touring, EPCC records for ECM New Series and Virgin Classics, and most of the songs recorded are on Billboard's bestseller list. Lovallo said the song "Litany" reached fifth on the list.

"Many good classical CDs sell five to 10,000 copies," Lovallo said. "Their recordings have sold more than 100,000, which is incredible."

Saturday's concert will be in Latin, the language traditionally used for classical or religious pieces, but the program will have both the Latin and English versions of their songs.

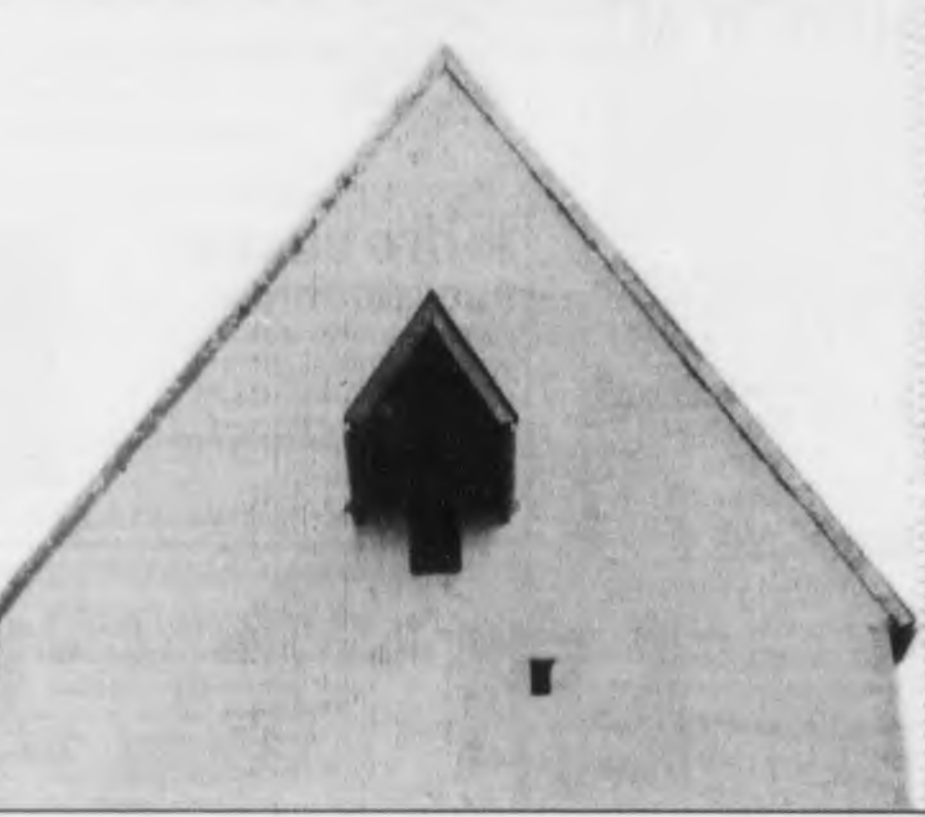

The 22-member choir and 26-member orchestra is chiefly being conducted by Kaljuste. A guest conductor for many different choirs including the Vancouver Chamber Choir and the Netherlands Chamber Choir, Kaljuste has experience conducting Mozart and other traditional operas. He also works with the National Opera Estonia.

Rod Walker, director of K-State choral activities, said the choir is having quite an effect in choral circles, and the Estonian tradition is highly thought of.

"It's great they are here," Walker said. "They will be pleased. We have an excellent hall, and the concert will be great."

Given this opportunity, Walker said it would be a wonderful experience for students and the local community to take advantage of this concert.

"It's exciting that they are here," he said.

Revue of Rodgers, Hammerstein works to be showcased

By REED DUNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

A mixture of some of Rodgers and Hammerstein's best works will be brought together this weekend.

"Some Enchanted Evening," a musical revue of the works of Rodgers and Hammerstein will be showcased at the Columbian Theatre this weekend. The show also will play next weekend from Feb. 18 to 20. All Friday and Saturday shows start at 7:30 p.m., with Sunday matinees beginning at 2 p.m. Dinner begins an hour and a half before each show.

Scott Kickhafer, artistic director of the Columbian Theatre, said the show is a theatrical performance with no spoken dialogue. He said the story is told through lyrics.

"There is no dialogue," he said. "The lyrics are used as dialogue between the characters."

The show presents the steps of preparing for an actual production showing a rehearsal, the dress rehearsal and a final performance as the theme of the show. Kickhafer said this creates the need for a number of scenery and costume changes on stage.

Music from some of Rodgers and Hammerstein's best known works will be showcased. Kickhafer said the theater is expecting the show to be as successful as previous reviews of the duo have been.

"We're kind of banking on the fact everyone loves Rodgers and Hammerstein," he said.

Lara Dillinger, playing the part of Anna, said her character name was based off a character from "The King and I," but that is not the basis of her songs. She said there is no need for dialogue, because Rodgers and Hammerstein wrote their music poetically.

"The music tells its own story," she said. "Rodgers and Hammerstein wrote the poetry and then created the music to go with it."

Dillinger said along with the recognizable music, director Karen Hastings has added comedic timing and changes in pace to make the show more than a concert.

"It's not just going to be like going to hear a concert of music," she said. "There is much content built between the characters and staging."

Rich Shermoen, playing the part of Billie, said the show definitely will be different than a concert, including six characters with development through the music.

"You've got a character and you are playing a part," he said. "The approach and the delivery is different from what it would be at a concert. You're singing to an audience and in this format you are interacting with other characters."

Just a sample of the great works from Rodgers and Hammerstein have been selected to be included in the show, Shermoen said. He said works from such shows as "Oklahoma!" and "The King and I" will be included in the performance.

"There's such a wonderful, rich library that Rodgers and Hammerstein have," he said. "This picks up some of the best numbers they have. I think it will make for a great evening of entertainment."

Experience gained from the K-State forensics team and theater department is where Dillinger credits her success.

"My experience there really is the basis of where I am today," she said.

Tickets for the show still are available, but are going fast, Kickhafer said. Tickets for the Sunday performance are not available, but all other shows have some tickets available.

Steve Forbes quits presidential race, says 'no' to New Jersey Senate run

By WALTER R. MEARS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Steve Forbes cashed it in Thursday and ended his costly quest for the Republican presidential nomination, saying "we were nosed out by a landslide."

He said he left with no regrets, offered no candidate endorsements, and said no to the question of running for the Senate at home in New Jersey.

"Today I am withdrawing from the presidential contest, but I'm not withdrawing from the public square," Forbes said at a combination farewell rally and news conference in a Washington hotel ballroom. About 80 campaign workers applauded a final reprise of the flat-tax, anti-abortion speech he had used in his second truncated presidential campaign.

He spent more than $30 million of his publishing fortune on the 2000 campaign and more than $37 million in 1996.

Forbes said it was money well spent because he'd moved the Republican debate toward his conservative agenda. "And that agenda will come to pass, mark my words," said Forbes, who stood with his wife, Sabina, at his side. Two of their five daughters also were with him, misty-eyed.

Forbes decided to quit after running third, with 20 percent of the vote, in the Delaware primary Tuesday. Gov. George W. Bush won by a landslide, and Sen. John McCain, who did not campaign in the state, beat Forbes.

"As my father once said when he lost a governor's race in New Jersey, we were nosed out by a landslide," Forbes said.

In 1996, Delaware was one of two primaries Forbes won before yielding to the inevitable nomination of Bob Dole.

Bush, on taxes and conservatism, and McCain, campaigning as an outsider challenging the establishment, both laid claim to Forbes' supporters for the South Carolina GOP primary Feb. 19. Conservative Alan Keyes is the third candidate still running, but with only marginal support.

Bush issued a statement praising Forbes as a fighter "for conservative principles and cultural change."

"They're all good people," Forbes said. "I'm not going to endorse right now." He said if he does, it will be at least a few weeks from now.

New Jersey elects a new senator in November, but Forbes said he won't enter that contest. "I've done enough running this year," he said.

He wouldn't discuss long-term political options — there will be contests for governor of New Jersey in 2001 and for a democratic Senate seat there in 2002. "I've never ruled out today another foray into elective politics," Forbes said. "I can't foresee the future."

Forbes told his supporters that the problem wasn't with his message, "even though the messenger has been a bit messed up and bruised..." He said his campaign had changed the Republican dialogue, and doubted whether Bush or McCain would be dealing with tax changes — they both want cuts — but for his push on the issue.

That's debatable. His effect on campaign money is not.

Forbes' self-financed campaign in 1996 hit Dole with a damaging series of attack ads, forcing him to spend all he could within federal limits to clinch the nomination. As a result, Dole had to scrimp on his campaign that spring and summer, while President Bill Clinton poured money into early re-election ads.

This time, Bush is breaking all fund-raising records, taking in $70 million. He declined the federal subsidies that carry primary campaign spending limits with them to avoid the trap that hampered Dole. Bush could afford it, and the threat of unlimited spending by Forbes gave him a rationale for it.

Forbes said he'll be back at work today. "I will be going back to Forbes Magazine," he said. "In fact, tomorrow I've got to write some editorials."

"Deadlines are deadlines," he said. "They spare no one."

Subcommittee endorses regent budget

By DAVID MILES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A higher education budget with an extra $1 million to help ease the sting of recent tuition increases won the endorsement Thursday of a House Appropriations subcommittee.

The budget is for the state's 2001 fiscal year, which begins July 1. The subcommittee is proposing that $548.7 million of state money be spent on state universities, the same amount that Gov. Bill Graves proposed.

The subcommittee plans to present its recommendations Monday to the entire Appropriations Committee.

Although the subcommittee's proposal contains the same amount of money as Graves' recommended budget, it would allocate money in different ways.

At the request of Appropriations Chairman David Adkins, R-

Leawood, the subcommittee included $1 million to help offset two tuition increases that are scheduled to take effect this fall.

"I'd like to carve out some commitment to student financial aid," Adkins said.

The money would be transferred from the budgets of state universities.

About $667,000 would be spent on student financial aid, with the rest going to increase salaries of student workers.

Although the money would come from the six state universities, the portion for financial aid would go to students at all of the regents' institutions. Those include the six state universities, 19 community colleges, 11 vocational technical schools, Washburn University of Topeka and 17 private colleges.

The additional aid should be welcomed by Kansas students. The regents approved one tuition increase in June, then another in December.

Together, with new library and technology fees, the cost of enrolling at the University of Kansas and K-State will be 10 percent higher this fall than it was last fall.

The increase will be 10.5 percent at Wichita State University and 9.6 percent at Emporia State University, Fort Hays State University and Pittsburg State University.

The regents approved the second increase to raise $5.4 million and offset a 1-percent budget cut.

On Thursday, Farmer suggested that the subcommittee cut the regents' budget by $5.4 million. Other subcommittee members did not agree with him.

Farmer noted that legislators have to pare the overall state budget by $10.7 million in order to make it balance.

"We need to share the pain a little bit," Farmer said.

Senate confirms federal judge nominees

By JIM ABRAMS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott pushed through the confirmation of two federal judges Thursday, defying an effort by his fellow Republicans to block all nominations put forward by the Clinton administration.

"I don't think we should, or would, be able to go all year without confirming any nominations," Lott, R-Miss., said in explaining his decision to press ahead with the votes. "Some of these are good men and women ... and in some of these states, there truly is a need for more judges."

The Senate voted 96-2 to confirm Thomas Ambro as U.S. Circuit Judge for the Third Circuit and 95-2 to approve Joel Pisano to be U.S. District Judge for the District of New Jersey.

The long-simmering standoff between the administration and Senate Republicans over federal judges boiled over at year-end. That's when Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., accused President Bill Clinton of violating an agreement on making temporary recess appointments, a method of bypassing the Senate confirmation process.

Inhofe said 19 Republican senators had joined in deciding to put holds on all judicial nominees.

Under Senate tradition, a single senator can block further floor action on a nominee by putting a hold on the nomination.

In this case, with Democrats accusing Republicans of playing politics in blocking worthy judicial nominations, Lott decided to move ahead with votes on the two non-controversial judges.

Lott said he believed the White House did try to work with his office on the recess appointment issue and "my feeling is that we should not start filibustering these nominations."

Inhofe continued to assert that Clinton broke his word last December by reappointing Sara M. Fox to the National Labor Relations Board. The Constitution gives the president the right to make appointments during a congressional recess, with the nominee allowed to serve until the end of the following year.

The senator said his effort to block future judicial nominees was "the only chance in eight years to hold the president up to his word."

Inhofe was joined by 18 other Republicans who voted no in a 79-19 vote on whether to move to final consideration on the two judges. He and Sen. Bob Smith, R-N.H., voted against confirmation of the two.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, thanked Lott and committee Chairman Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, for working with him on the nomination issue, but said there were still 77 vacancies, nearly 10 percent of all federal judgeships.

Racial fairness studied in death sentences

By MICHAEL J. SNIFFEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Justice Department disclosed Thursday it is reviewing whether racial minorities unfairly have been given more federal death sentences than white defendants.

The review, initiated two months ago at Attorney General Janet Reno's request, is not a moratorium on executions like that announced recently by Illinois Gov. George Ryan in his state, Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder said.

But the White House said last Friday that President Bill Clinton is considering a Democratic senator's request for a suspension of federal death penalties pending the outcome of a study like the one Reno ordered.

"We want to make sure that the system is as fair as it can be," Holder told a news conference.

"The study was ordered by the attorney general, I'd say almost out of an abundance of caution," said Holder, who is leading the review. "We don't have anything to our knowledge that gives us reason to believe that there is a disparity within the system. But we want to make sure that is so."

Holder said the study would not prevent the Bureau of Prisons from setting an execution date for any of the 21 people on the federal death row at the U.S. penitentiary in Terre Haute, Ind. Two-thirds of those prisoners are minorities.

With appeals under way, no dates have been set for executions.

Reno established an elaborate Justice Department review system for deciding whether to seek death penalties, including private hearings for defendants' lawyers. But the final decision belongs to her.

Though she personally opposes the death penalty, Reno has authorized federal prosecutors to seek death penalties in 149 cases, out of 517 reviewed under her procedure.

The last federal execution was in 1963. In 1972, the Supreme Court ruled the death penalty had been applied unfairly. State and federal procedures were revised, so the high court restored the death penalty on the federal level in 1988.

Last week, Clinton spokesman Joe Lockhart said the president is concerned about the issues raised by Illinois' decision and will consider putting federal executions on hold.

The suspension request came in a letter from Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., and is being reviewed by White House counsel, Lockhart said. He said there's no guarantee Clinton will act soon.

Feingold based his request on Ryan's halt of executions in Illinois until authorities determine whether the death penalty is administered fairly. Since 1977, Illinois has executed 12 prisoners. But 13 Illinois death-row inmates have been exonerated since 1987 through appeals, DNA evidence or, in a few cases, persistent investigation by college journalism students.

Asbury's future with K-State uncertain due to losing record

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Murphy's Law suggests that if anything can go wrong, it will.

Unfortunately for K-State men's head basketball coach Tom Asbury, Murphy appears to be right.

After Saturday's 94-65 blowout loss to intrastate rival Kansas, K-State's 10th consecutive loss, the topic among K-State supporters has changed from how many football games the Wildcats will win next year to Asbury's coaching future at K-State.

Following K-State's 18th straight loss to the Jayhawks, Asbury seemed to be expecting questions about his future in Manhattan.

"We'll talk a little bit about the game," Asbury said. "One thing I'm not going to talk about is the job situation. So don't ask."

Asbury, who has two years remaining on the five-year contract extension he signed in 1996, is on the verge of having his third losing season in six years as the Wildcats' coach.

This year, his Cats are 8-14 overall and 1-10 in the Big 12 Conference with five regular-season games remaining, three of which are at home.

In those six seasons Asbury's 84 victories rank him fifth in school history. But Asbury's 83 losses are creeping up, and with two more, he will become the first K-State coach to have a losing record since Fritz Knorr, who coached the Cats from 1944 to '46.

Perhaps the biggest knock on Asbury has been his inability to win conference games — most of all, conference road games.

Asbury has a 28-59 conference record at K-State, including a 5-33 mark in conference road games.

Asbury has continued the tradition of defense at K-State. Until this year, K-State had been the conference's best defensive team four years running. In 1998, the Wildcats ranked No. 1 in the nation in field-goal-percentage defense, holding opponents to 37.1 percent from the field.

In Asbury's tenure as coach, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics has worked to improve the facilities. Outside of the behind-the-scenes work by the department, the men's and women's basketball programs opened a new weight room this year, and Bramlage coliseum, which is just 12 years old, is top-notch.

In 1996, Asbury's $165,000 per year base salary was on par with that of the rest of the conference coaches. Although, in the past four years several Big 12 schools have undergone head-coaching changes, which in turn might have pushed Asbury's salary down on the scale.

With that in mind, Asbury still makes more in base salary than Kansas coach Roy Williams, who pulls in $122,548 a year. Granted, it is estimated that Williams makes in the vicinity of $900,000 to $1 million with incentives, compared with Asbury's $400,000-$500,000, but Athletic Director Max Urlick, who wouldn't comment on Asbury's job status, did say Asbury's compensation is significant.

Another aspect of Asbury's tenure has been the criticism of K-State's recruiting budget. Unlike the salaries, budgets are not public record, but nonetheless, Bob Cavello, director of business operations, said Asbury gets what he requests.

"All coaches ask for and write their own budgets," Cavello said. "He has never been denied one dime for recruiting budgets. He has always gotten everything he has asked for."

The recent decline in victories also has meant an absence of fan support.

Attendance has decreased by nearly 1,000 people per game this year. In fact, K-State's 8,230 per game in 1999-2000 is the lowest since 1996, when the Cats averaged 7,210.

Despite the controversy surrounding Asbury's job stability, senior guard-forward Josh Reid said the team tries to remain focused on the matter at hand — winning games, no matter how hard it seems to be these days.

"We try not to pay attention to it," Reid said. "We keep a tight-knit family, and we're all in the same boat here. Coach is a competitive person as well as everyone else on the team, so we're going to keep fighting and try to get some more wins."

STORIES BY MICHAEL NOLL

Women's team makes big shots at crunch time to defeat No. 8 Cyclones

What a difference a win makes.

The K-State women's basketball team, on the heels of breaking a five-game losing streak with a win at Oklahoma State, knocked off its first ranked opponent in almost a year, defeating No. 8 Iowa State 69-63 on Sunday.

During the losing streak, K-State had struggled to finish games strong. That was not the case against the Cyclones.

After Iowa State took its first lead of the game at the 4:35 mark in the second half, the Cats refused to buckle under pressure.

Instead, the Cats kept battling.

Eventually, K-State regained the lead with 44.7 seconds remaining in the game and never looked back.

Iowa State head coach Bill Fennelly said the Cats made big shots at crunch time.

"They hit some big ones at big times, and we didn't," Fennelly said.

To keep the Cyclones at bay during the final seconds of the game, the Cats depended on late free-throws from forward Angie Finkes, who had gone zero for three from the line against Oklahoma State on Wednesday.

"Coach Ethridge told me, 'You are not a 50-percent free-throw shooter. You better make these.' She was like yelling at me on the sideline," Finkes said. "I just tried to relax and pretend like we were at practice."

Finkes shot 4 of 6 from the stripe in the last three minutes, and the Cats scored the last seven points of the game to clinch the win.

Overall, the Cats put together their best performance of the year, in a large part due to their success in the areas they had struggled with previously.

"I'm just ecstatic for this team," K-State head coach Deb Patterson said. "I felt as though they truly did put together a 40-minute game, and there's no better feeling when you walk off the floor knowing you answered every challenge that the game presented to you."

The Cats started the game by jumping out to an early 19-6 lead. All five starters contributed to the run, and when Iowa State made a run of its own to close the Cats lead to two points, K-State managed to maintain the lead entering halftime with a 31-29 lead.

"We handled their run and we stepped up, finally," K-State guard Kim Woodlee said.

In the second half, the story remained the same. K-State shot 53 percent from behind the arc, and the team played persistent defense on Iowa State, keeping the Cyclones to 12 percent in the half.

Four Cats scored in double digits during the game, and K-State was 12

Fraternity pleads guilty to charges

By SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Delta Tau Delta fraternity pled guilty to three charges of violating the Greek Affairs anti-hazing policy Friday in a closed hearing, Mike Goodpasture, Interfraternity Council president, said.

An informal complaint was made against the fraternity in January. The informal complaint system allows the individual making the charges to remain anonymous, Goodpasture said.

To protect the student's right to privacy, Goodpasture said it is left to the fraternity's discretion as to how much information they release concerning the charges and sanctions.

Delt president Jeff McKasson declined comment on what the charges or sanctions were.

K-State's anti-hazing policy states that hazing is "any instance of physical abuse, psychological abuse or improper obligations, requirements or time restrictions associated with or involving new members or their activities."

In a written statement, McKasson said the Deltas agree with the ruling and plan to follow the sanctions.

"The ruling of the Judicial Board on Feb. 11, 2000, is just and fair. Delta Tau Delta agrees with the sanctions that are placed upon us, and we have every intention to abide by these sanctions. We are working with our alumnus and our international fraternity to make the appropriate changes to assist the Gamma Chi Chapter of Delta Tau Delta to live by our mission statement, 'Committed to Lives of Excellence.'"

School stress can lead to honor code violations

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"On my honor, as a student, I have neither given nor received unauthorized aid on this academic work."

The pressure to get the grade or get the assignment done can make a student forget about this unspoken pledge they have made by enrolling in K-State classes.

"Generally, students are tempted to take a shortcut when they are tired, stressed, have too much to do, or are behind in their work for whatever reason," said

Phil Anderson, director of the Undergraduate

Honor Council and instructor of speech communication. "I know

students are under a lot of pressure. I still remember the pressure I felt when I was in college."

Last fall's reports of academic dishonesty generally occurred in the middle and end of the semester when students are under more pressure than usual, Anderson said.

"It just depends on how much of their soul they're willing to trade in for a grade," he said.

If a violation of the Honors Policy occurs, a student usually receives a grade of

"XF" on their transcript. The "X" signifies that academic dishonesty is the reason the course was failed.

The "X" can be removed from the transcript after the student completes a five-week course about academic honesty.

The "F" is a permanent part of the student's transcript.

There were 15 students involved in alleged academic dishonesty last fall. Five students received a grade of "XF," five students' cases are pending and the other cases were resolved in some other way than a grade of "XF."

"The course focuses on personal integrity, not counseling,"

Anderson said. "It is designed to educate students on the risk of academic dishonesty and help them evaluate their dysfunctional decision-making."

2 police officers wounded by suspect wanted in Texas

SUTHERLAND, Neb. — A Lincoln County sheriff's deputy and State Patrol trooper were shot and injured as they pursued a man wanted on Texas warrants.

State Patrol officers said Sunday that Charles Lannis Moses Jr., 31, of Nocona, Texas, had not been apprehended after Saturday night's shootings in western Nebraska and was considered armed and dangerous.

Police had been alerted earlier in the week that Moses, who was wanted in Texas for violating probation and possessing explosive devices, might be in the area, Patrol Sgt. Mark Larson said.

At about 11:30 p.m. CST Saturday, a Lincoln County Sheriff's deputy tried to arrest Moses at a convenience store along Interstate 80 near Sutherland, between North Platte and Ogallala, Larson said.

Moses pulled a handgun, and the deputy wrestled the gun from him, but Moses fled in a pickup truck south on a county road, Larson said.

Sheriff's officers and State Patrol officials began pursuing Moses, authorities said. At one point in the pursuit Moses got out of the truck and fired a rifle into the windshield of Sheriff's Deputy Stan McKnight's car, Larson said.

McKnight was shot in one hand and suffered injuries to his face. He was transported to Omaha for reconstructive surgery on his hand.

At another point, Moses fired a rifle into the door of State Patrol trooper Jeffrey Crymble's cruiser. The bullet went through the door and struck Crymble in the stomach.

Crymble was in serious but stable condition Sunday at a hospital in North Platte.

Moses turned southbound onto Nebraska Highway 24 and eluded officers because of snow and icy road conditions, Larson said.

Police in bordering states such as Colorado and Kansas have been alerted that Moses could be in the area, Larson said.

Serbia wants compensation for cyanide spill damages

BECEJ, Yugoslavia — Serbia announced Sunday that it will demand compensation at an international court from those responsible for a cyanide spill that contaminated a major river, destroying most aquatic life.

The spill in the Tisa River, which originated in Romania, apparently sunk to non-lethal levels Sunday after reaching the Danube.

Before that, however, it had devastated the river in Hungary and Serbia. Serbian Environment Minister Branislav Blazic said it would take at least five years for life in the Tisa to recover.

Blazic accused Romania of covering up the real dimensions of the poisoning, which some environmentalists say could be the biggest ecological catastrophe in Europe since the Chernobyl nuclear reactor catastrophe in 1986.

"The Tisa has been killed. Not even bacteria have survived," Blazic said as he toured the area along the river in northern Serbia. "This is a total catastrophe."

"We will demand an estimation of the damage, and we will demand that the culprits for this tragedy be punished," he said.

Romania played down the environmental damage. But people — not just aquatic life — are at risk because of the spill, said Predrag Prolic, a professor of chemistry and toxicology at Belgrade University. He said those with wells close to the riverbed are in danger. Birds feeding off fish could die, he said.

The poisoned water also can filter into the soil and then contaminate grass, grain, and livestock, Prolic said.

Serbian Agriculture Minister Jovan Babovic said that after the toxic waste entered the Danube, the concentration of cyanide dropped below 0.2 milligrams a liter, a non-lethal level.

But the Beta news agency cited eyewitnesses who said the Danube was "all white with the bellies of dead fish" between the spot where it joins the Tisa and Belgrade, about 50 miles to the southeast.

Baltimore train hits barrier, injuring several passengers

A light-rail commuter train arriving at Baltimore-Washington International Airport hit a safety barrier at the end of the line Sunday, injuring the train operator and many of the 22 passengers, a transit official said.

Maryland Mass Transit Authority spokesman Frank Fulton said the injured were transported to several area hospitals.

Cartoonist Charles M. Schulz dies as 'Peanuts' era draws to close

By MARY ANN LICKTEIG
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN FRANCISCO — "Peanuts" creator Charles M. Schulz died on Saturday, turning his farewell note in Sunday papers into an epitaph for both a comic strip and its creator.

Schulz was 77, and he died in his sleep at about 9:45 p.m. at his home in Santa Rosa, his son, Craig Schulz, said.

He was diagnosed with colon cancer and suffered a series of small strokes during emergency abdominal surgery in November 1999. He announced his retirement a few weeks afterward.

Schulz had seemed fine earlier in the day and had gone to his daughter Jill Transki's home in Santa Rosa. Only his wife, Jeannie, was with him when he died, Craig Schulz said.

His wildly popular "Peanuts" made its debut Oct. 2, 1950. The travails of the little round-headed kid and his pals eventually ran in more than 2,400 newspapers, reaching millions of readers in 68 countries.

His last strip, appearing in Sunday editions, showed Snoopy at his typewriter and other Peanuts regulars along with a "Dear Friends" letter thanking his readers for their support.

"I have been grateful over the years for the loyalty of our editors and the wonderful support and love expressed to me by fans of the comic strip," Schulz wrote. "Charlie Brown, Snoopy, Linus, Lucy... how can I ever forget them..."

It ended with his signature. Over the years, the Peanuts gang became a part of American popular culture, delivering gentle humor spiked with a child's-eye view of human foibles.

Sergio Aragones, a Mad magazine cartoonist and friend for more than 30 years, called Schulz a true cartoonist.

"In a couple of centuries when people talk about American artists, he'll be the one of the very few remembered," Aragones said. "And when they talk about comic strips, probably his will be the only one ever mentioned."

One of the most endearing qualities of "Peanuts" was its constancy.

The long-suffering Charlie Brown still faced misfortune with a mild, "Good grief!" Tart-tongued Lucy still handed out advice at a nickel a pop, a joke that started as a parody of a lemonade stand.

Snoopy, Charlie Brown's wise-but-weird beagle, still took the occasional flight of fancy back to the skies of World War I and his rivalry with the Red Baron.

Schulz was born in St. Paul, Minn., on Nov. 26, 1922, and studied art after he saw a "Do you like to draw?" ad.

He was drafted into the Army in 1943 and sent to the European theater, although he saw little combat.

After the war, he did lettering for a church comic book, taught art and sold cartoons to the Saturday Evening Post. His first feature, "Li'l Folks," was developed for the St. Paul Pioneer Press in 1947. In 1950, it was sold to a syndicate and the name changed to Peanuts, even though, he recalled later, he didn't much like the name.

Although he remained largely a private person, the strip brought Schulz international fame. He won the Reuben Award, comic art's highest honor, in 1955 and 1964. In 1978, he was named International Cartoonist of the Year, an award voted on by 700 comic artists around the world.

He was to have been honored with a lifetime achievement award May 27 at the National Cartoonists Society convention in New York.

In his later years, he spent much of his time at his Redwood Empire Ice Arena in Santa Rosa, about 60 miles north of San Francisco, where he frequently played hockey or sipped coffee at the rink's Warm Puppy snack bar.

"Peanuts," meanwhile, had remained an intensely personal effort. He had had a clause in his contract dictating the strip had to end with his death. While battling cancer, he opted to retire it right then, saying he wanted to focus on his health and family without the worry of a daily deadline.

"Why do musicians compose symphonies and poets write poems?" he once said. "They do it because life wouldn't have any meaning for them if they didn't. That's why I draw cartoons. It's my life."

New building to house civil engineering department, library, auditorium

The Durland Complex addition to Fiedler Hall will be completed by fall 2000. The project cost $12.3 million.

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The addition to the Durland Complex will be complete and ready to go by fall 2000 for civil engineering students.

The construction of Fiedler Hall, which is located behind Rathbone Hall in the Durland Complex, began in late 1998. Once completed, it will house a new electronic-engineering library, laboratories, classrooms, an auditorium and the Department of Civil Engineering.

Stuart Swartz, head of the civil engineering department, said the auditorium will be used to schedule assemblies and conferences, and classes possibly will meet in the space.

However, it has not yet been set what the uses for the auditorium will be in the future.

Jerry Carter, university architect and director of facilities planning, said construction crews are putting in the stone and windows on the exterior of the building. Dry wall, acoustical ceilings and wiring are being installed inside, he said.

Carter said because of the unseasonably mild weather Kansas has seen this year, there have been no delays concerning the project.

"We are moving right along with some of the procedures inside," Carter said. "With the good weather we have been having lately, we have also seen no significant delays."

Swartz said the department, now housed in Seaton Hall, tentatively is planning on moving into Fiedler sometime in June. He said it is its goal to be fully installed well before classes begin in August.

"There are already classes scheduled in Fiedler in the fall line schedule, so we will be fully functional by then," Swartz said. "We are looking forward to having the entire college together and not being scattered around the campus."

Andrew McCoy, senior in civil engineering, said having the department in a different building has not created any problems for students thus far, because in the College of Engineering, students are required not only to take classes that pertain to their area of concentration, but also inter-departmental classes.

"It hasn't really been a problem because we are traveling between buildings anyway," McCoy said. "As an engineering student, we not only take classes in civil engineering, but between the departments as well."

Swartz said one of the benefits of Fiedler will be the extra space and putting the College of Engineering together in one building.

He said areas for labs and classrooms will be more efficiently organized, and it will make things more convenient for both faculty and students.

"New space is always nice, and it will bring everyone together," Swartz said. "It will be structured so that classrooms and labs will be in close proximity to each other, and the space will be somewhat larger and clean from dust."

McCoy said it will be nice when Fiedler is completed because not only will the college be together in one complex, but the new building also will allow for better classrooms and technology.

"It will be a wonderful change," McCoy said. "We will have more classrooms and better technology in a building that is not falling apart."

The money needed for the $12.3 million project came in part from a $5 million donation by Alice Fiedler in memory of her husband in 1998.

This was matched by the state of Kansas, and another $2 million was raised through fund-raisers from the College of Engineering.

Councils missed opportunity to better greek system

A golden opportunity appeared Thursday to improve the greek system. That opportunity was missed — badly. Instead, the greek system furthered its reputation as an elitist group uninterested in the well-being of its struggling members.

When officials from the Interfraternity Council and the Panhellenic Council met to discuss possible changes to the Homecoming bidding process, they missed a chance to improve their images and display a commitment to supporting all members of the greek community.

The officials met to look into improvements to the Homecoming pairing process, possibly eliminating bidding. They adopted some changes that include more limitations on how often houses can be paired together. Fraternities will have a two-year rule, meaning that no fraternity can be paired with the same fraternity in consecutive years.

Once that pair is decided, they cannot be paired with a sorority that either house has participated in Homecoming with for the past four years.

IFC and Panhellenic, however, refused to abolish the bidding process completely. This shows they are not committed to improving and supporting all greek organizations; rather, they're committed only to improving and supporting the ones that already are strong.

These minimum length requirements will allow fraternities to switch between pairings while still maintaining partnerships with only a few other fraternities. This hurts struggling fraternities, as they are unable to get a pairing with one of the stronger, more dominant fraternities.

Likewise, sororities that struggle now will be pushed further to the brink of destruction because fraternities will be able to reject or select them based on stereotypes and other criteria.

Besides this disregard for struggling fraternities and sororities, it also shows the hypocrisy of IFC and Panhellenic. While they both have preached the importance of minimizing the effects Homecoming will have on members' academics, they refuse to rid themselves of bidding, which is the single-biggest culprit in draining time.

IFC and Panhellenic leaders have professed a dedication to improve the system.

Their actions, however, speak quite to the contrary.

IFC and Panhellenic should reconsider their decision.

If they truly want to improve Homecoming week, they need to overhaul it.

The bidding process should be thrown by the wayside.

pitfalls of FAST FOOD

Drive-through convenience leads to unhealthy lifestyle

Ah, the joys of fast food: quick food on the go, accessibility late at night, the convenience of delivery and only 35 grams of fat per serving. Eat two McDonald's hamburgers and you're done for the day, according to daily recommended values of fat intake.

That's not even counting the essentials like fries and a drink, and you can forget about an apple pie or Blizzard for dessert. It's no wonder Americans are some of the most overweight members of the planet.

I, myself, am partial to Taco Bell and Wendy's. What's not to love about a pretty tasty meal for under a buck or fries dipped in a heavenly Frosty? Plus, I don't have to make it. All I have to do is eat it.

But one year and 10 pounds later (and counting), I started to think about what I was feeding myself. Basically, I concluded that I might as well eat grease three times a day.

Think about it. You get a pizza, sprinkle some Parmesan cheese on it and the cheese immediately turns orange as it sucks in the grease. Or have you ever seen a fast-food hamburger being made? I have glimpsed such a sight briefly. It was pretty gross. That is precisely why I've never been willing to work at a fast food restaurant because then I would know exactly what I was eating.

Sure, it is easy to pick something up on the way home, and it is even easier to eat the food, but what kind of nutrients is your body receiving? Basically, none.

True, you might get some protein, and some people like to count lettuce and tomato as a serving of vegetables, but the fact remains that all these potentially good parts of food are being tainted. They are drenched in mayonnaise (which is one of my weaknesses) or deep-fried in grease. Any iota of nutrients get fried away or drowned away in condiments.

To make matters worse, we routinely feed our children hamburgers and fries. Treating children to a Happy Meal now and then is no problem, but children who get fed fast food on a regular basis (and not all of them do) are being cheated. They are deprived of healthy meals and essential nutrients, and often are overweight.

If a child's (or adult's, for that matter) day begins with cereal, then a school or outside lunch (which is not completely devoid of nutrition), followed with a hurried trip to Burger King for dinner, think about what is in his or her system.

Plus, add onto that the snacks that children (and adults) eat — fruit snacks, cookies, candy and other assorted goodies. There now is sugar, grease, fat and gluey bread in the child's or adult's digestive system.

So, would society be better off without these wonderfully convenient restaurant chains? Despite my concerns, I would say no. They provide jobs, and they are convenient.

However, fast food should be a treat — not a habit. For those days when there really is no time, then, yes, fast food is a nice luxury to have around. But for the days when you just don't feel like cooking, why not make a sandwich (on wheat bread) with some soup or fruit or something? Food like that doesn't take too long to make, and the clean-up is pretty easy, too.

Why not allow fast food for dinner rarely for children, and adults, you just have to use self-control. I, too, love the fries, pizza, tacos and burgers. But, in this case, there can be too much of a good thing.

Alcohol-free residence halls should be option for K-State students

Before I get to my primary topic for this week, I need to provide some additional information and corrections regarding my column about Ron Greer on Jan. 31.

I incorrectly reported that activists broke into Greer's house; actually, they only vandalized the outside. Greer also was fired in part because he accused Madison's fire chief of favoritism toward gay firefighters. Most sources also seem to indicate that Greer gave Bible tracts somewhat regularly to fellow employees.

Several readers have notified me that Greer also ran for Congress in 1998. However, according to my original sources and to Madison's WISC-TV news, all of the events I reported, with the exception of Greer's being fired, occurred in early 1997, long before he would have announced his candidacy. While these facts do shed some additional light on what occurred, none of them change my assertion that Greer was treated horribly by the city of Madison and by Madison's militant activists because he expressed his beliefs.

In an issue closer to home, on Feb. 2 the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls voted to make all the residence halls smoke-free by fall 2001, with smoking 70-percent eliminated by fall 2000.

According to KSUARH

President Dave Woodruff, the action was taken primarily to reduce fire hazards, and also because smokers were "infringing on the rights of non-smokers to breathe clean air."

I am not a smoker myself, but I do live in the residence halls. While this will reduce the fire hazard, I don't think it will make a substantial difference otherwise. Nearly every hall already has designated smoking and non-smoking wings. I am not bothered by a small amount of smoke outside my room, though it might affect some residents with a strong aversion to smoke.

However, if KSUARH wants to really improve the housing system, it should deal with a much bigger problem — alcohol.

Assistant Director of Housing and Dining Services Derek Jackson told me that at least once a week, a student has to be taken from one of the halls to the hospital because of alcohol poisoning. According to the 1997 College Alcohol Study, 60 percent of students had their sleep or study interrupted by an inebriated roommate, and about half had to care for a drunk peer during the course of a year. Plus, as the recent string of alcohol-related deaths at campuses across the nation shows, the presence of readily available alcohol in a living environment presents a substantial liability for the facility's owners. Not to mention that most hall residents are younger than the legal drinking age.

True, it technically is against the rules for underage residents to consume or possess alcoholic beverages in the residence halls. This now is my fourth semester in Marlatt Hall, and I can say that in practice this rarely is enforced. My freshman year I served on the Hall Judicial Board, and we heard a total of three cases the entire year. The actual number of violations probably was closer to 3,000. The general lack of enforcement, combined with the fact that older residents are an easy source of alcohol, makes the rule poorly effective.

What should be done, then? I am not proposing that we completely ban alcohol in all the halls. It would be a great idea, but I'm not sure that would go over too well. Instead, I have a more modest proposal: create one or more substance-free housing facilities.

This is what numerous other large universities across the nation have done, including Iowa State University, the University of Kentucky, the University of Michigan and Washington University in St. Louis. According to U.S. News and World Report's "Best Colleges" issue, "School officials have found that substance-free dorms or halls — which prohibit alcohol, drugs, and often cigarettes from the premises — have significantly lower levels of vandalism and tend to be cleaner than regular student housing."

For many students, their freshman year is a big stumbling block. A load of freedom, responsibility and temptation is suddenly dropped in their laps. If freshmen had the opportunity to live in a place that is substance-free and where academics are emphasized, perhaps the dropout/blunkout rate for the first year wouldn't be so high.

But will such a proposal work? According to U.S. News, "At the University of Michigan, 30 percent of students currently opt to live in substance-free dorms." Boundless Webzine reports on a similar initiative at Iowa State University, which has a size and student body similar to that of K-State.

At first, the ISU idea was widely lampooned. One student wrote in the campus paper that, "Only Boy Scouts would live there." But when Maple Hall began taking applications for its first year, more than 1,200 freshmen applied for 400 spots. The remaining 100 spots were given to upperclassmen who had been selected because of their good grades and record of campus involvement, and are intended to provide leadership and role modeling — something generally missing in most halls here, where more than 90 percent of the students are freshmen.

In addition to zero-tolerance rules on substance abuse, students must keep up their grades and volunteer in a campus organization of their choosing. The hall is co-ed by floor.

If K-State were to take the lead of other universities across the nation by offering more academically focused, substance-free and support-intensive living options, it would be a tremendous benefit to students, particularly freshmen. It's an initiative whose time has come.

That story about four girls watching "Who Wants to be a Millionaire?" — that's not a story. Now five, that's a story.

When did all the liberals on campus start embracing censorship? You can attack what Roney and Elliott say, but you should not attack their right to say it.

I would like to commend Jeremy Finney and Teresa Huffman on their very thought-provoking and highly intelligent words in their letters to the editor. Thank you for standing up for your beliefs and stating them so well.

It seems to me that softball would be the most logical sport to add, because there's already facilities in town, and it's a pretty popular sport throughout the state of Kansas.

Cats break 5-game losing streak

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It rained three-pointers in Bramlage Coliseum on Sunday.

In its defeat over No. 8 Iowa State, K-State women's basketball team drained 12 treys to tie its season high set against Eastern Michigan on Nov. 30.

Four Cats made shots from behind the arc against the Cyclones zone defense. Guard Kristin Rethman led the way with five baskets from downtown, a statistic that Rethman credits to extra work during and after practice.

"I've gotten in some extra shooting, and that helps a lot, and plus we worked all week on it," Rethman said. "Everybody worked together real well on just picking them apart. We did a good job."

K-State's regular downtown bombers Rethman and guard Kim Woodlee, who made three treys, led the team. The duo continued with what has been a tremendous season from behind the arc, a year in which Woodlee became the school's all-time three-point record holder with 188 treys. Rethman also is climbing the charts by tying Woodlee for sixth in three-pointers made in a season.

In addition to Rethman and Woodlee, two other Cats stepped up to make three-pointers at critical moments in the contest.

In the first half, guard Morgen Finneran helped extend K-State's early lead by hitting her third three-pointer of conference play.

Then, in the second half, guard April Sailors, a perimeter threat early in the season who has been quiet during conference play, turned red hot, hitting 3-of-4 treys during a 4 1/2 minute stretch in the second half.

Despite Iowa State's inability to contain K-State's perimeter players, the Cats dead-eye shooting was not a surprise to the Cyclones, guard Stacy Frese said.

"Rethman and Woodlee have proven they're great shooters, and I think that Sailors stepped up and so did Finneran," Frese said. "They all took turns making the three."

In planning for Iowa State, the Cats expected the perimeter game could be the game's deciding factor, especially since the Cyclones play a zone defense almost 100 percent of the time, head coach Deb Patterson said.

"We knew that our perimeter players would have to be on," Patterson said. "I'm really proud of Kristin, and April and Kim. They really stepped up and, I thought, took of 27 from long distance. Finkes, Woodlee and forward Nicky Ramage all tallied 12 points, and guard Kristin Rethman led the Cats with 15 points on five treys.

On the other hand, Iowa State, which leads the Big 12 in three-point shooting, mustered a 6 for 22 performance.

More importantly, the Cats kept Cyclone sharpshooter Stacy Frese to three points on one for 13 shooting from the field.

"I think we just knew not to help off of them (Frese and guard Megan Taylor) because they are such three-point threats," Rethman said.

Finkes said defense was critical in the game's final moments.

"They all say defense wins games, and I think that definitely is what did it for us today," Finkes said.

educational psychology, is designing and implementing the seminar as part of her course objectives for Internship in College Student Personnel.

"It is difficult to predict what lasting effects this seminar will have on students," Marcoux said.

Marcoux said making the leap from changed beliefs and values to changed behaviors requires a commitment to personal responsibility, which is an individual choice.

"We hope to provide the practical tools to make better ethical decisions and then to self-monitor those decisions," she said.

Anderson said past reports show academic dishonesty has occurred in every college.

Reports last semester occurred within the colleges of Arts and Sciences; Architecture, Planning and Design; Agriculture; and Human Ecology.

"In some cases, the students were confused that what they did would be construed as cheating," Anderson said. "The faculty tried to make it very clear what the boundaries were."

The K-State Honors Policy is set by the faculty on a given assignment, and the faculty should make it clear to students when collaboration is allowed and times when collaboration isn't allowed, Anderson said.

There has been an increase in reporting academic dishonesty violations because there is a centralized place to report it, he said.

The Honors Policy was enacted in fall 1999.

"I think the policy has had a positive effect," Anderson said. "The faculty, in general, are doing a lot to support and promote the policy."

Even the Internet hasn't had much of an effect on cheating at K-State, he said.

"We know there are Web sites that encourage cheating and the use of the Internet to cheat, but we have search engines that find these Web sites, and we can see what's out there.

"The best policy for students is to do their own work and to learn to be the kind of scholar your teachers are helping you to become," he said.

The Office of Student Activities and Services is accepting applications for student Honor Council positions.

The council handles breaches of academic honesty and conducts hearings and appeals for adjudication.

Lea Stueve, senior in family life and community service, is serving as vice-chairman of the council.

"Personally, I've put in a lot of time serving in the whole process representing students and voicing their concerns," Stueve said. "It's very worthwhile. It is a hands-on process. You can make a real difference helping KSU maintain its integrity and set high goals for future students."

1 killed, several wounded in Yugoslavian fighting

By ELENA BECATOROS

KOSOVSKA MITROVICA, Yugoslavia — Fighting between peacekeepers and snipers, along with grenade attacks on ethnic Albanians, killed one person and reportedly wounded 18 Sunday in the bitterly divided city of Kosovska Mitrovica.

Two of the wounded were French soldiers, hit by ethnic Albanian snipers firing from the northern, Serb-controlled part of the city, NATO officials said.

"It was an attempt to kill our soldiers," French spokesman Lt. Col. Patrique Chanliau said. "We would like to believe it was an isolated incident of extremists, of terrorists."

One soldier was wounded in the stomach while on patrol in the Serb part of the city, Chanliau said. The second soldier was shot in the arm after NATO peacekeepers launched a counterattack, he said.

The counterattack killed one of the snipers and wounded five others. Grenade attacks on ethnic Albanian houses in the north wounded seven, NATO said. Peacekeepers imposed a dusk-to-dawn curfew.

Yugoslavia's state-run news agency, Tanjug, said a further four people, identified as Serbs, had been wounded, at least one by a sniper.

Bursts of semiautomatic gunfire could be heard from the northern side of the mostly Serb city located about 20 miles north of Pristina. Occasional explosions sounded over the gunfire, which died down by afternoon.

Some sniping continued. Chanliau said, but the peacekeepers had located the positions from where the snipers were firing.

Serb sources, who asked for anonymity, said the trouble began when several ethnic Albanians from the southern side crossed a bridge over the Ibar River leading to the Serb side and threw several hand grenades. A large number of Serbs gathered, they said, and NATO peacekeepers tried to control the crowd.

Cats lose Sunflower Showdown 65-94 to KU Jayhawks

Travis Reynolds sits on the bench and watches as the final seconds tick away in the Wildcats' 94-65 loss to the Jayhawks on Saturday afternoon at Bramlage Coliseum.

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/ COLLEGEIAN

The No. 20 Kansas Jayhawks and K-State Wildcats were playing for different reasons Saturday, and in the end it was all Hawks as they downed the Cats, 94-65, at Bramlage Coliseum.

In the Sunflower Showdown's season finale, Kansas set records for most points and the largest margin of victory on the opposition's home court.

K-State (8-14, 1-10) was trying to avoid losing its 10th consecutive game, and Kansas (18-6, 7-3) was trying to remain in the Big 12 title hunt. The Hawks also were looking to rebound from a skid of their own, after suffering one of the worst losses in school history, an 86-53 setback at Oklahoma State on Feb. 7.

Kansas' triumph marked its 18th in a row over K-State and 17th straight victory in Manhattan. In fact, Kansas has yet to lose at Bramlage Coliseum — 12 meetings.

The Cats, who haven't won since Jan. 8 when they defeated Nebraska to open conference play, were beaten in every way possible.

After jumping to a quick 2-0 lead, which also would turn out to be K-State's only lead, the Cats were faced with a 26-8 deficit with 10 minutes left in the first half. K-State had neither offense nor defense in the game. Head coach Tom Asbury said Kansas was able to execute its game plan at will.

"I felt very confident that we had our guys ready," Asbury said. "I think we understand what they do, and we obviously didn't do what we needed to do, and they did pretty much exactly what they wanted to do."

Kansas added to its lead and entered halftime with a 50-23 lead on the shooting of sophomore point guard Jeff Boschee, who hit four first-half three-pointers. Boschee led the Hawks in the game with a career-high 24 points and six three-pointers.

Halftime just postponed the end, or at least gave K-State a little relief from a half in which it shot a dismal 32 percent from the field, compared with the Hawks' 49 percent.

Senior forward Tony Kitt, who led K-State with 20 points and nine rebounds, said K-State knew the game was lost as early as halftime, and that pride was on the line in the second half.

"Going into the second half, anything can happen, but the reality of being down 27 points — you're not going to win. We could at least make it decent," he said.

In fact, Kansas' halftime lead was its largest ever in head coach Roy Williams' 12 seasons at the school.

Asbury said Kansas outdid his Cats in every aspect of the game.

"Kansas played terrific," Asbury said. "They out-coached us, outplayed us, outshot us, outrebounded us and kicked our butts."

"We obviously panicked and got away from the things we knew we needed to do. We didn't show much of a semblance of offense, which is evident by our field-goal percentages. It was just a very one-sided game."

When asked about how resilient he had to be, Asbury replied: "I have to be. What's my alternative?"

K-State's next action is Saturday, when it plays host to the Missouri Tigers at Bramlage Coliseum.

Football players honored Sunday

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Faculty, fans and friends of the K-State football program paid a final tribute to the many achievements of the 1999 Wildcats at the annual awards ceremony Sunday evening in McCain auditorium.

The evening was a tribute not only to the 11-1 record and Holiday Bowl victory of last season's squad, which finished as the highest-ranked in K-State's history, but also to the decade of dominance just concluded by the Wildcat football program.

The images, speeches and awards were interspersed with video of memorable Wildcat plays and players from the preceding decade, one in which the once-hapless Wildcats achieved the vision of head coach Bill Snyder.

"Ten years ago, as we entered the '90s, I can remember saying that this could become the program of the '90s, that that was our goal," Snyder said. "Indeed, with the help of everybody in this

Loss to KU brings record to 1-10, saddens K-State players

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

The Kansas Jayhawks continued their reign over K-State in basketball with a 94-65 victory Saturday.

It was the Hawks' 12th straight victory in Bramlage Coliseum, and KU has yet to lose there. It also was the 18th straight victory for Kansas in what once was a thriving rivalry.

It also was the Jayhawks' final victory over senior forward Josh Reid, who Saturday played in his last regular-season Sunflower Showdown, having lost every time.

"It's very disappointing," he said. "I have always dreamed of playing KU, and I never thought I would play them and never win a game against them."

Reid, who is enduring a difficult losing streak, missed a good portion of the season because of a foot injury.

"It's been a tough year, you know, we haven't been winning, and I haven't been playing," Reid said. "We were hoping this would be a game where we could turn our season around."

Reid scored three points in 14 minutes Saturday. The loss dropped K-State to 1-10 in the conference and broadened the basketball gap between the two schools.

Despite the margin of victory, Kansas sophomore guard Jeff Boschee said there always will be a rivalry between the two schools.

"It always will (exist), because of the great tradition between the two schools," Boschee said. "Going into this game, we were looking to compete well and just improve and do the right things."

Junior forward Kenny Gregory said the rivalry still is alive.

"I think it is still a rivalry, because if they would have won today, the students would have stormed the court," he said.

Men's team exhibits courage in face of losing season, campus criticism

The K-State men's basketball team is 1-10 in the Big 12 Conference and coming off a difficult loss to Kansas on Saturday.

The game was a dismal and frustrating performance for everyone involved.

Frustration has been the buzzword around Manhattan this season. Fans are ticked off, players are upset and Tom Asbury is just as frustrated. I understand the players' frustration, because losing is the hardest thing a person has to do in life.

However, I also applaud the team's courage, and I realize it sounds weird to point to courage in these times of basketball woes, but right now courage and pride are what it boils down to for the Cats.

The team has had a difficult season, in which it is hard to find any positives. This is a year in which the Cats have lost when they played well, and also have been embarrassed in defeat.

Now, they go out and play with their backs against a wall, with the monkeys and all kinds of animals hanging on their backs and the pressure on to win.

They continue to battle on and try to fight out of the darkness of losing. They hear the skeptics talk about head coach Tom Asbury's future, and they hear their fellow students diss them in the Campus Forum.

It all can start to weigh on an athlete's mind.

Picture yourself and the job that you do. Whether you are a desk worker at the Chesters E. Peters Recreation Center, or you are a graduate teaching assistant, whatever the job, imagine being under the campus' microscope and having to work in front of a group of people who are going to rip and ridicule you every time you make a mistake.

Imagine picking up the newspaper and reading about how some anonymous guy thinks you suck as a graduate assistant, or the way that you scan IDs is incorrect. It is the type of thing that would make you freak out after a while. So imagine the pain the men's basketball team is enduring, and think about the courage it is exhibiting.

You talk to the players and look at Asbury as he coaches and addresses the news media, and you can see nobody hates losing more than Asbury and his players.

These are men who can't escape the losses by turning off the television or not reading the paper. They can't wish away their losing streak simply by changing the subject to the New York Senate race, or a Ken Griffey Jr. trade to the Cincinnati Reds, because it's always in the back of their minds.

In fact, it is more difficult for them, because while the rest of us can turn a deaf ear to the team, they are forced to live out the season. They are forced to listen to the questions as to why they are not winning.

The truth is they probably do not have a definite answer. They are playing with courage, and right now they are discovering a critical lesson in life, that sometimes no matter how hard you try, failure still occurs.

Sometimes, no matter how many basketball camps you attend in the off-season or lay-up drills you run in practice, you just do not have enough to win.

I am not saying the team is incapable of winning, and in life sometimes the hardest thing to do is fight out of a slump.

Still, it takes courage to stand at center court before tip-off, with the spotlight bearing down on you, and play to the best of your ability, because that is the only thing you can do. It also is what pride dictates should be done.

As the Cats enter the homestretch of the season, they simply should play for themselves—the 12 men on the roster, because nothing else matters.

At this point, standings don't really matter. The Big 12 title is far out of reach.

The critics, forget about them. The Cats gets a thousand more everyday, and critics are something that you deal with, but they cannot spend a great deal of time talking about.

Finally, forget about the future. The future and the state of K-State men's basketball could change dramatically after the season, but for right now, if you are a player, the speculation is irrelevant. More importantly, the past is even less significant.

Right now, all that matters is that K-State players and coaches are taking the court every game, and playing their tails off for 40 minutes, win or lose, and no matter what happens at the end, they have fought the good fight.

It literally is about pride right now for K-State, and in the closing weeks, we will find out how much pride K-State has.

Crude oil rate increase leads to higher prices at gasoline pump

By BROOKE ERICKSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gasoline prices rose more than 4 cents a gallon at the pump during the past three weeks on the strength of unseasonably high demand and a surge in crude oil prices, an industry analyst said Sunday.

Crude oil prices are up amid uncertainty over whether the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries will increase output when an agreement on lowered production expires next month.

Michael Babcock, professor of economics, said gas prices are negotiated by OPEC. The organization sets the price for the international market. OPEC tries to get the highest price it can for its oil, and then countries agree on a quota.

"Since the United States has such a strong economy, there is a strong demand for petroleum," he said.

The national average price on Friday, including all grades and taxes, was $1.4105 a gallon, up 4.29 cents, according to the Lundberg Survey of 10,000 stations nationwide.

The average price was about a nickel a gallon less than the peak of about $1.46 in November 1990.

Seventy percent of the demand for gasoline comes from transportation.

The United States is a leader in transportation with airlines, railroads and trucking.

"People are buying a few bucks here and there, just to get out of town and buy gas elsewhere."

— Mike Borgelt, senior in psychology

But these companies have found ways to be more energy efficient, Babcock said.

Prices might seem high, he said, but Americans pay less for gas than any other country in the world.

Mike Borgelt, senior in psychology, is a sales clerk at Texaco Food Mart.

He said people in Manhattan seem irritated by the rising gas costs.

"Every other person that walks in to pay for their gas complains to me about the increases," he said.

"They ask me if I know when the prices are going to go back down, but I don't know that."

He said people are buying $5 or $10 worth of gas instead of filling up their tanks.

"People are buying a few bucks here and there, just to get out of town and buy gas elsewhere," he said.

Babcock said people could keep money in their wallets and gas in their cars, in the long run, by riding their bikes to school or car pooling. It's advice that at least one K-State student is taking.

Borgelt said he rides his bike to school more now that prices have increased.

However, Babcock said even if large numbers of people did the same, it probably wouldn't put enough downward pressure on the price of gas to lower costs.

But he said he doesn't think prices will go up too much any time soon.

Emily Harrod, senior in social sciences, said she is ready for gas prices to drop.

"The other day I bought $10 in gas and it didn't even fill half my tank," she said.

Students get chance to preview majors offered at K-State-Salina campus

Faculty deliver mock lectures, campus tours.

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fabulous Friday took place last week to give students a better understanding of the K-State-Salina campus and to let potential students "test-drive" the various majors.

The day gave about 60 high school juniors and seniors the opportunity to learn about the different majors within the college. Students were able to pick two of the seven majors to learn about during a 45-minute session.

The College of Aviation and Technology sponsored the event.

"It's a nice way for our faculty to expose students," said Matt Melvin, assistant dean and director of college advancement.

"It's one of our more popular recruiting programs."

Students attending their two chosen sessions were given mock lectures by faculty.

In addition, the faculty members also talked about the major and, to demonstrate it, put on different programs.

Melvin said a program like this gave students a first-hand experience with the college.

"Students think it's neat," he said. "They get a hands-on demonstration of what they're interested in."

Traci Cole, enrollment services coordinator, said students interested in computer science technology went through a programming exercise, and students interested in aviation majors learned the physics of flying.

Students also were able to take a tour of the campus, residence halls and the various labs.

"It's a real important part of introducing kids to our campus," Cole said.

Melvin said the K-State-Salina campus is a high-tech, high-show campus, and it is important for students to come see all they have to offer.

"The whole goal is to get people on our campus to see the technology," Melvin said. "They can really see the stuff, instead of a brochure where they just read about it — they can see it and decide if it's a good fit for them."

He said they needed to see the toys and the equipment in order to help them decide. Students interested in aviation were shown different airplanes and received a tour of the hangars.

"They got a good glimpse of all the planes we have," Melvin said.

Cole said the planes and other technology Salina has to offer are impressive.

"A lot of people are impressed when they come onto our campus," Cole said.

Faculty and current students were available after the majors fair to answer any questions or concerns.

Melvin said the interaction with the faculty and students was a benefit to the students.

"They know when they come here there is someone to help them out," Melvin said. "We can assist them in the transition to college and through college."

Cole said they received very good feedback from the participants.

"It backs up their decision to come here when they come on campus and see everything. It confirms they've made a good decision," she said.

Study reveals effect of romantic movies

By JAINA K. STUTHEIT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Watching a romantic movie with your date on Valentine's Day just might bring you closer to that special someone.

According to a recent study at K-State, romantic movies can affect couples.

Richard Harris, professor of psychology, said the research was done in last September and October with a sample of 265 students. The study was done mostly in group sessions, using autobiographical memory methodology.

"Autobiographical memory methodology is asking someone to remember an experience they've had and asking them questions about that experience," Harris said. "We asked students to think of a time when they saw a romantic movie on a date, and asked them questions about their thoughts and behaviors during the movie. We also asked them about their response to the movie and evaluation of the date."

Harris said the most interesting result was that although women tend to like romantic movies more than men, some men actually enjoy romantic movies.

"Usually it's the woman who chooses to watch a romantic movie, but 40 percent of the time it's a mutual decision," he said.

Harris said he thinks the reason women tend to prefer romantic movies more than men is that they are more relationship-oriented.

"I think women give a higher priority to relationships," Harris said. "It makes sense that a movie about relationships would appeal more to women."

In the study, students also were asked fantasy questions about what scenes they might like to act out. The choices were a sex scene, a daring rescue scene, an intimate conversation scene and a romantic scene.

"The most common choice selected by both men and women was a romantic scene," Harris said. "There was more interest in a romantic scene by men than women thought. Forty percent of both men and women said they wanted to see their date in a romantic scene."

Harris said both men and women overestimated how much their date would want to be in a sex scene.

He said only 21 percent of men and 3 percent of women chose the sex scene.

When asked about their behaviors during a romantic movie, 46 percent of the students said they kissed, 53 percent said they put their arms around their date and 67 percent said they held hands.

"When we asked about their thoughts during the movie, some of them said they were thinking about their date," Harris said. "Others said they were thinking about what would happen after the movie."

Of the 60-70 movies mentioned by participants in the study, Harris said that "Titanic" and "Runaway Bride" were the ones most people had seen. "Notting Hill" and "Shakespeare in Love" also were popular.

Morgan Brown, shift manager at Blockbuster Video, said the most commonly rented movies are "Pretty Woman," "Sabrina," and "When Harry Met Sally."

rent a romance

Here are the Collegian's suggestions for romantic movies:

"An Affair to Remember"
"American in Paris"
"American President"
"As Good as It Gets"
"Beautiful Girls"
"Bird on a Wire"
"Breakfast at Tiffany's"
"Bull Durham"
"Cocktail"
"Dirty Dancing"
"Doctor Zhivago"
"Ever After"
"Everyone Says I Love You"
"Far and Away"
"Flashdance"
"Fools Rush In"
"Four Weddings and a Funeral"
"Gone with the Wind"
"The Graduate"
"Jerry Maguire"
"Little Women"
"Love Jones"
"Love Story"

"Matchmaker"
"Moonstruck"
"Murder's Wedding"
"My Best Friend's Wedding"
"My Girl"
"An Officer and a Gentleman"
"One Fine Day"
"Only You"
"Out of Africa"
"Pretty Woman"
"Reality Bites"
"Romancing the Stone"
"Romeo & Juliet"
"Sabrina"
"Sense and Sensibility"
"Sixteen Candles"
"Sleepless in Seattle"
"Splash"
"The Thomas Crown Affair"
"A Walk in the Clouds"
"Wedding Singer"
"When Harry Met Sally"
"While You Were Sleeping"

"We have four copies of 'When Harry Met Sally,' and we're always out," she said.

Brown said that from what she has observed while working at Blockbuster, most of the time a woman rents a romantic movie.

"I have noticed, though, that if a man is renting a movie for a date, he usually picks a romantic one," she said.

From a woman's perspective, Brown said she does not necessarily prefer romantic movies but enjoys all types of movies.

"I don't really think of it as a gender thing," she said.

Alex Reisenweber, sophomore in horticulture, said he doesn't mind watching romantic movies but would probably watch one only with a woman.

"If I were planning to go to a movie on a date, I would probably choose a romantic movie rather than an action movie, because that's what a woman would probably enjoy more," he said.

For women trying to convince their boyfriends to watch a romantic movie with them on Valentine's Day, it might not be as difficult as they think.

For men whose girlfriends are trying to convince them, the research shows they will at least get to hold her hand. They might even get a kiss.

K-State counselors help students deal with stress, overcome breakup woes

■ Money, faithfulness, future plans common issues in relationships.

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fear of being alone is the No. 1 reason why people have such a hard time with break ups, said Elisabeth Sundermeier, a doctoral intern for University Counseling Services.

Other issues are personality differences and worries about people gossiping, she said.

Although each relationship is different, Sundermeier said it's important to redevelop oneself and know that you can be OK on your own.

"We recommend that people work on themselves as much as possible," she said.

"They need to get a solid sense of themselves."

Most surface issues that people approach Sundermeier with revolve around money, faithfulness and differences in future plans, she said.

Sundermeier said freshmen deal mostly with developmental issues, whereas seniors have problems transitioning into the real world and where their partner fits into their plans.

"When you get real serious, you have to decide how you are going to be as a team," she said.

Some couples aren't able to work differences out and break up. Those who have had longer relationships aren't as ready to jump into a new relationship, she said.

"Jumping straight into something can be pretty counterproductive," Sundermeier said. "You haven't resolved the issues that caused the breakup, and you are

Getting Help

According to University Counseling Services, most students who seek counseling are having difficulty with relationships.

60% of people go there to talk about relationship issues, either family or friends or boy/girlfriends.

65% of all those who go for any problem are females.

30% of all those who go for any problem are seniors.

just bringing them into the new relationship."

The most important thing to do after a breakup, or even while in a relationship, is to rediscover yourself.

Simple things people can do is figuring out what made their life fun, and how they used to spend their free time, she said.

"The ideal relationship is where you want another person in your life, but you don't need them," she said.

Tigger

TIME

KELLY FURNAS

'The Tigger Movie' shows warmth appropriate for all ages

Children's movies often are critiqued on only two criteria — their appropriateness for children and the level of tolerance a parent must possess to sit through the movie.

But Disney's latest triumph, "The Tigger Movie," exceeds these criteria by so much that it would be inappropriate to say it is a good children's movie.

It simply is a good movie — regardless of genre.

In this latest tale of the gang from A.A. Milne's Winnie the Pooh stories, a lonely Tigger is on the search for his family with the help of the rest of the crew. Although the movie hardly is more than an hour long, it is able to pack in several musical numbers, some sharp action sequences and an awfully heartwarming story.

If anything, the movie might be too emotional for children. Tigger's constant loneliness and the subsequent depression of those around him could be a bit heavy for children, but the movie tries to make up for it by also throwing in several laughs. The droopy donkey Eeyore — hardly an upbeat character — actually provides much needed comic relief.

Don't think of "The Tigger Movie" as a typical Disney film. The movie does not have any spectacular animation like "Beauty and the Beast," nor are the musical numbers especially dynamic as they were in "The Lion King." The dialogue is not overly clever and in terms of acting, the voice-overs in the movie are just mediocre.

The movie overcomes these simply by having a lot of heart. There's not a feeling that this movie is trying to overdo it or impress the viewer with spectacular effects.

Does the movie fit the two aforementioned criteria? Easily.

First, there hardly are any movies in the past decade that are more appropriate for children. "The Tigger Movie" does not rely on any violence, toilet humor or adult themes to entertain.

Instead, it is overwhelmingly kind and polite.

Robbins' 'Cradle Will Rock' highly underrated movie

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

A few inches to the left, and "Cradle Will Rock" could have been a disaster. The movie contains so many themes and storylines and characters that the viewer can't help but be confused during a great deal of the film.

But writer-director Tim Robbins stops just short of overload to create one of the season's most wonderful — and most underrated — films.

This historical piece, set in the 1930s during the rise of the Works Progress Administration, paints the picture as it was for about a dozen characters during the time frame. The characters include some famous names —

Orson Welles, played by Angus MacFadyen, and Nelson Rockefeller, played by John Cusack — but also include a homeless girl with dreams of acting, a desperate playwright, an Italian artist, a snobby producer, a vaudeville has-been and several others. The story is anchored around the production of a musical, "Cradle Will Rock," which is so politically charged that it draws attention from Washington, D.C., and eventually is shut down by the actors' union.

Robbins finds a way to weave the stories together so even those without a vague clue about the historical context of the movie still can enjoy the story.

That said, this film undoubtedly would be enjoyed more by those with some knowledge of the WPA or animosity toward communists. Viewers otherwise could spend unneeded time trying to figure out whether they are supposed to know a name from their history class.

Even with that knowledge, however, this movie has a lot of teaching to do on its own, yet it does it in such a unique way. Instead of showing how bad communism was or how bad unions were, this movie takes the high road and shows how bad everything was, despite a person's status. Not only was communism bad, but so was capitalism. Not only were unions bad, but so were the managers who tried to take advantage of workers. The movie makes the viewer drop all biases.

Robbins' greatest accomplishment in this movie is, without a doubt, the screenplay. It's not that his direction was poor, but he was working with such a talented crop of actors that his hardest job must have been getting the cameras to point in the right direction.

Indeed, the film has many recognizable names and faces, but more importantly an abundance of terrific performances. No one has a poor performance, but some of the standouts include Cherry Jones as Hallie Flanagan, the director of the Federal Theater Program.

No character in this movie shows the confidence and upbeat spirit of Jones' character, and the result is a constant bright spot anytime she is on the screen. MacFadyen brilliantly plays the eccentric yet brilliant Orson Welles, who is directing "Cradle Will Rock." MacFadyen stops short of making Welles either a hero or an egocentric character, but instead portrays a well-intentioned man with numerous flaws. Finally, Vanessa Redgrave plays Countess LaGrange, a naive but good-hearted wife of steel magnate Gray Mathers.

What's remarkable about this performance is not as much what the character does for the film, but just how different the role is than any other character Redgrave ("Girl, Interrupted," "Smilla's Sense of Snow") has played. Her depth of acting is unquestionable after this movie.

Robbins' depth is becoming unquestionable as well. Although this movie has not been popular with audiences, it still is a positive mark in Robbins' career, which already includes terrific spots in acting ("The Shawshank Redemption"), directing and writing ("Dead Man Walking").

Final chapter of 'Scream' trilogy most disappointing

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The best thing about the new "Scream" movie is — it's the last one.

What started out as a clever approach to horror films has become progressively more mundane with each installment. "Scream 2" was too confusing for viewers to understand, and "Scream 3" is nothing more than old tricks.

In what is being billed as the trilogy's final chapter, a series of murders is taking place on the set of the movie, "Stab 3." These murders are based on the murders the viewer saw in the first two movies. This movie-within-a-movie tactic is nothing new — "Stab" also was prominent in "Scream 2." The murders bring the old cast to Hollywood to help investigate, with predictable results.

In fact, the only new developments in this movie are that the killer now has a device to imitate others' voices, and Neve Campbell is battling hallucinations.

Director Wes Craven still knows too much about creating horror movies to say he has lost his touch, but he definitely is out of touch with his target audience. The entire appeal of the first "Scream" movie was that it was something different from all other scary movies. It also was a comedy, mystery and action film.

But instead of trying to rewrite the rules of horror films, Craven relies on the same tired tricks of characters jumping out from behind doors and the killer showing up behind other characters.

The acting in the film is reprehensible. Every actor in the movie seems to be playing his or her TV counterpart — Neve Campbell in "Party of Five," Courteney Cox Arquette in "Friends," Lance Henriksen in "Millennium" and even David Arquette in the 1-800-CALL-ATT commercials. This movie might be the best example of TV actors not removing themselves enough from their best-known characters.

The biggest draw of the movie is to figure out the identity of the new killer and the identity of the victims. But seriously, just ask a friend to explain it for you. This movie is not worth sitting through two hours to find out.

McCain 2000 SEASON PERFORMANCE SERIES

Makoto Nakura - marimba

"Makoto Nakura, the stunning young Japanese marimba virtuoso, is the star-turn of the [Spoleto Festival] concerts this year. His four-mallet work is simply breathtaking. The audience stamped and hollered and whistled for more." -THE POST AND COURIER Program includes works by: Pfitz, Tanabe, Bach, Albeniz, Sukegawa, Mozart and Eckardt.

Feb. 16, 7:30 p.m. Public: $12 Senior: $10 Student/Child: $6
Performance at First Presbyterian Church, Manhattan

Camelot

The story of King Arthur, Queen Guenevere, Sir Lancelot, and the Knights of the Round Table has been re-told countless times throughout history, but it had never been more beautifully portrayed than in the acclaimed musical, Camelot. Based on T.H. White's best-selling novel, The Once and Future King, Camelot recounts Arthurian legend with twentieth century wit and grace and a stirring score from Alan Jay Lerner and Frederick Loewe, creators of My Fair Lady and Brigadoon.

Feb. 20, 7 p.m. Public: $38, $34, $28 Senior: $36, $32, $26
Student/Child: $19, $17, $14

Corporate Sponsor: Meadowlark Hills

Call 532-6428 or come to the McCain box office

Box office hours: noon to 5 p.m. weekdays and two hours before performance time. VISA, Mastercard, and Discover accepted.

*Presented in part by the Kansas Arts Commission, a state agency and the National Endowment for the Arts, a federal agency. *This residency made possible by major funding from the Bell Family Endowment for the Performing Arts. Additional funding for all McCain events provided by the K-State Fine Arts fee.

room, and certainly these players, that's exactly what Kansas State University has become."

Junior wide receiver Quincy Morgan, senior linebacker Mark Simoneau, and junior tailback and return specialist David Allen were selected by the coaching staff as the three most integral players in K-State's 1999 season. They were recognized respectively as offensive, defensive, and special teams' most valuable players.

Morgan put teeth in the Wildcat air attack in '99, snaring 42 passes for 1,007 yards and 9 touchdowns, all team highs. Simoneau was a first-team All-American and Big 12 defensive player of the year, amassing 91 tackles, 6.5 sacks and two interceptions. Allen ran his way into the NCAA record books, tying the record for career punt return touchdowns with seven. His returns sparked comebacks for the Wildcats against Iowa State and Texas.

The coaches also distributed several awards recognizing players who weren't necessarily household names. Two redshirt freshmen, defensive end Andrew Shull and linebacker Terry Pierce, were co-recipients of the Overachiever Award for weight-room excellence. Junior quarterback Zac Burton was recipient of the Red Raider Award for scout team excellence, while sophomore long snapper Neil Gosch and senior linebacker Shelby Wehrman took home awards for perseverance as walk-ons.

The evening concluded with a farewell to K-State's 12 departing seniors. Departing senior safety and All-American Lamar Chapman closed by challenging the remaining Wildcats to carry their decade of dominance into the new millennium.

"Next year, we have to come back — we lost to Nebraska this year," he said. "It starts in the off-season — you have to work hard in the weight room, in conditioning, in the summer. Get ready to make something special happen next year."

Landry was a college star at the University of Texas, then a defensive back for the New York Giants in one of the innovative defenses of the early '50s — "The Umbrella," the first to put four backs deep to counter the passing game.

At 29, he became a player-coach in charge of the defense, a job now known as the defensive coordinator. He changed the front seven of the Umbrella from a 5-2 to a 4-3, essentially creating the middle linebacker position for Sam Huff. The system became such a success that Landry later had to devise the multiple offense to counter it. Both alignments remain standards at all levels of football, from Pee Wee to pros.

General manager Tex Schramm still was trying to get the NFL to award Dallas a franchise when he introduced Landry as the team's first coach. Their agreement was that Schramm would run the business side and Landry would be in charge of football.

A dynasty was formed through the unlikely pairing of the straight-laced, religious Landry and Schramm, the flashy showman whose promotional flair included bringing scantily clad cheerleaders to the NFL.

"We were totally different,"

Schramm said. "We were never close socially, but we got along very well because he had his domain, and we each knew where the lines were. I respected him, he respected me, and things worked perfectly."

Landry's Xs and Os betrayed his bland persona. He thrived on doing things differently, especially if he could mix in deception.

He created the "Flex" defense that placed one tackle a half-yard behind the other and he used gadget plays on offense, notably the quarterback throwback and the halfback pass.

His offensive line also had a gimmick — it would often crouch down, raise up and then reset, a style often imitated by kids on playgrounds.

"I really enjoyed the challenge of bringing a team to the game," Landry once said. "I enjoyed the challenge of that more than the actual game."

Landry was emotionless on the sidelines and in the locker room, even in the bitter cold of the Ice Bowl. He avoided becoming close to his players for fear that friendship would interfere with personnel decisions. Instead, he ruled through a stare known as The Look.

Former running back Walt Garrison summed it up best when he was asked if he ever saw Landry smile.

"No," Garrison said, "but I was only there nine years."

Gregory also said he can empathize with the struggling Cats. K-State still is looking to continue its 53-year streak of home winning records. Gregory and the Hawks were coming off a difficult loss as well, at Oklahoma State on Feb. 7.

"I was talking to Travis Reynolds toward the end of the game, and I said, 'Now you know how we felt on Monday,'" Gregory said. "That was a horrible feeling that we don't want to experience again. Hopefully, we won't have to feel that way again."

Reid said after the game that the team is going to continue working, and it hopes to overcome the adversity.

"I think the main thing I am going to tell my guys is to keep on fighting and good things will come," Reid said.

Georgia tornadoes kill 22, demolish towns

By ELLIOTT MINOR

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAMILLA, Ga. — Tornadoes descended on rural Georgia in the middle of the night Monday, ripping people from their beds and piling up mobile homes. At least 22 people were killed, and more than 100 were hurt.

Dozens of houses and mobile homes in the southwest Georgia town of Camilla were flattened, their metal and siding mangled and strewn across yards and streets.

“All you heard was a roar, woo-woo-woo,” said Johnny Jones, whose mobile home south of Camilla was thrown on its side. He said he freed his 14-year-old son, who was pinned under a washing machine, and they crawled out a window.

“All I could see was that everything was demolished. People were hollering and crying, ‘Where’s my child?’” he said.

The tornadoes struck shortly after midnight as a line of thunderstorms rumbled through the Southeast, scarring property from Arkansas to Georgia.

Authorities in Camilla and surrounding Mitchell County said two separate twisters cut a 1.5-mile-wide, 10-mile-long path through the county.

“It hit the impoverished and the affluent,” said Liz McQueen, an American Red Cross volunteer who was working at a temporary morgue near Camilla.

Fourteen people died in Mitchell County, a primarily rural area dotted with cotton and peanut farms, chicken processing plants, textile factories and a state prison. Gov. Roy Barnes, who flew over the area to assess the damage, declared Mitchell and three other counties disaster areas.

The twisters were the deadliest in Georgia since 1936, when 203 people were killed by tornadoes in Gainesville, northeast of Atlanta.

The winds snatched up the trailer where Janet and James Madeiras and their son Travis, 12, had been sleeping, tossing them out and knocking the trailer on top of them.

James Madeiras, 60, said they had just seconds to respond. “The moment I heard it, the bed dropped down and the walls came tumbling down on top of us,” he said.

“I was saying, ‘Oh my God!’ and started digging,” Janet Madeiras said. “When I got outside and looked around, everything was gone. You could hear moaning and crying.”

The family escaped without injuries and moved into a shelter with several neighbors.

Families of the injured and missing jammed phone lines and scrambled into hospitals to find their loved ones. There were so many injuries, people were sent to hospitals as far away as Tallahassee, Fla.

Mitchell County Hospital, with only 33 beds, was swamped with more than 120 injured people early Monday. The storms had knocked out power, and the small staff of doctors and nurses worked under backup power from a generator, trying to treat the wounded and find other hospitals to handle the overflow.

The town of Camilla, Ga., appears to be hardest hit by a tornado that cut a five-mile path through a housing development. Tornadoes slashed through southwest Georgia on Monday, killing 22 and injuring more than 100.

in Thomasville, a lost 4-year-old girl was at first too terrified to tell doctors her name. Her mother hadn’t been found Monday afternoon.

A preliminary assessment found 198 structures destroyed and more than 160 damaged, said Ed Tynes, supervisor of a Red Cross shelter in the gymnasium of the Mitchell County Middle School. More than 5,000 people were without power.

Wefald in recovery

■ University president recuperating at home.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State President Jon Wefald is on the road to recovery after being released Jan. 22 from Mercy Health Center on College Avenue for surgery for a colon infection.

“He’s doing really well,” Ruth Ann Wefald, wife of Jon Wefald, said. “He’s looking forward to going back to the office this week.

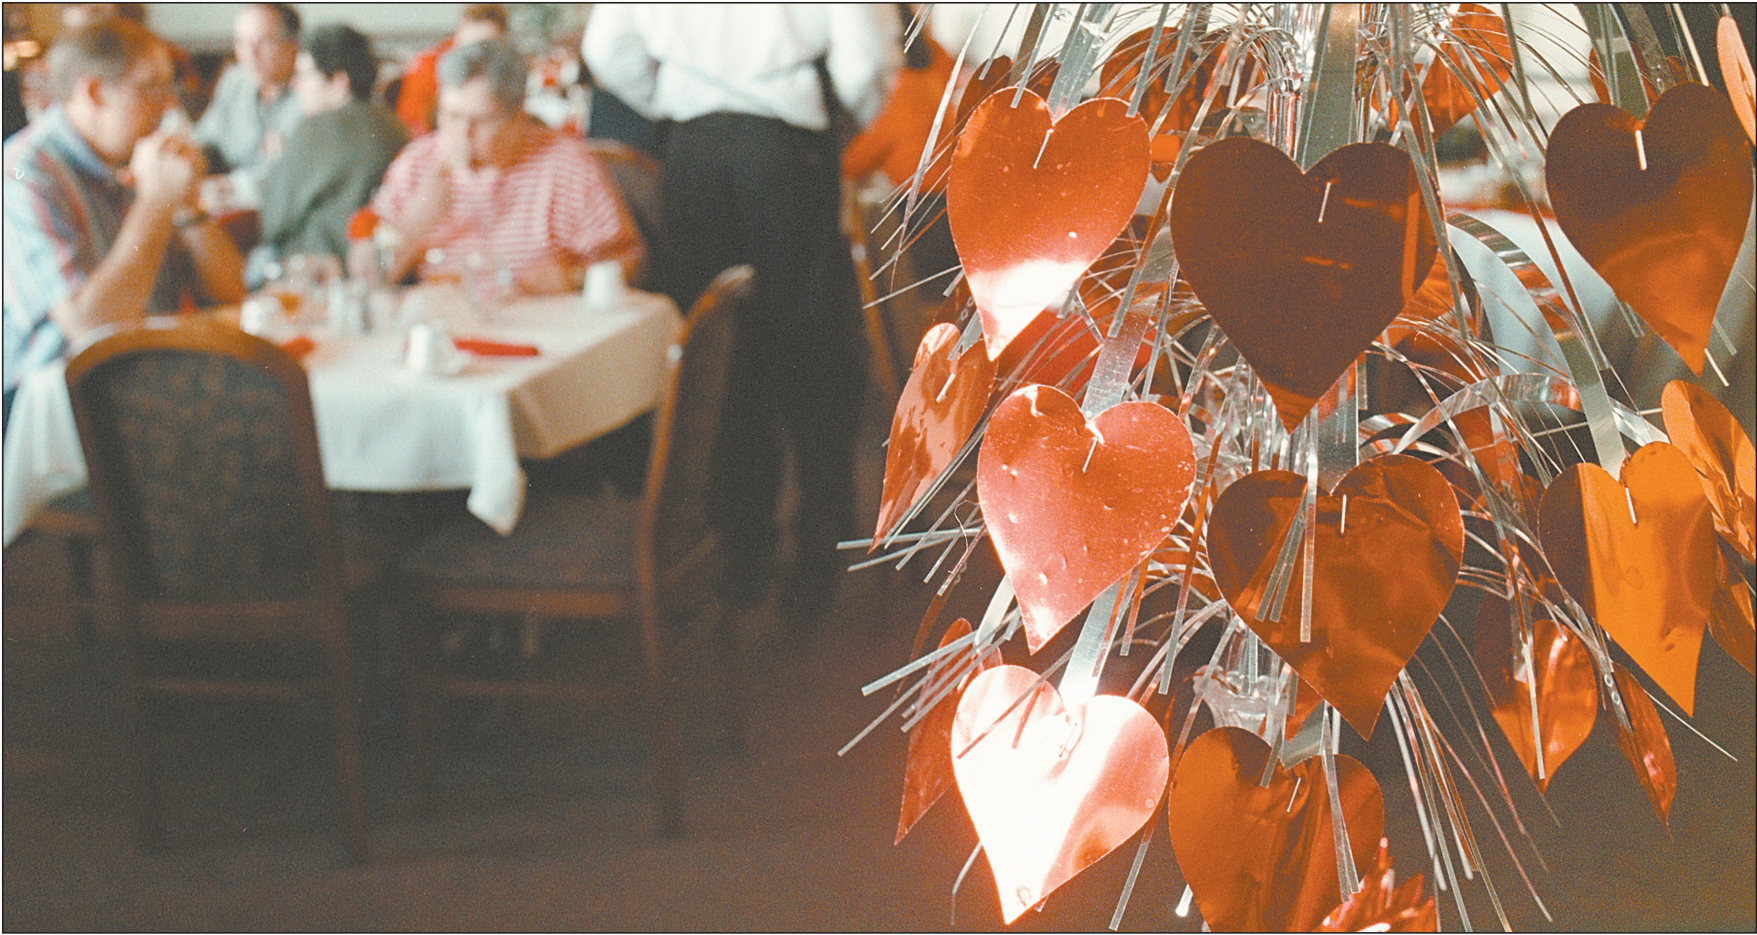

“Things are really chugging along,” she said. “He is extremely active. He is doing a lot of work by the telephone and having meetings at home.”

John Fairman, assistant vice president for institutional advancement, said business had not changed much at the office in his absence.

“We’re a good team, and we know what we need to do,” Fairman said. “Even though he’s not physically in the office, he’s able to do a lot of business over the phone.”

Ruth Ann Wefald said she is not only his wife and the first lady, but now she also is a secretary. She said both telephones have been ringing non-stop.

“This is a busy time of year,” she said. “But he hasn’t missed a beat in running the university.”

Preliminary trial for Reid questioned

By ANGELA KISTNER

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former K-State baseball pitcher Brett Reid might get a new preliminary hearing.

Reid was to be arraigned Monday on charges of attempted rape and aggravated sexual battery that allegedly occurred Oct. 30 and a separate charge of attempted rape that allegedly occurred Oct. 2.

However, his arraignment was continued until 10:30 a.m. Feb. 28.

District Court Judge Paul Miller said he considered the preliminary hearing invalid because attorney Daniel Franco, who appeared with Reid at his preliminary hearing, is licensed for the state of Missouri, not Kansas.

Reid appeared at court Monday with attorney Bruce

Barry, who had just met Reid that morning. Franco could not make it to the arraignment due to the conflict of two other cases.

Barry said he was appearing with Reid to enter a plea of innocent, but realized there was a motion on file determining the validity of the first preliminary hearing.

Miller told Reid he needed to reappear Feb. 28 with his own attorney, and if he did not have his own attorney, the court would appoint him a public defender.

Assistant County Attorney Bernard Irvine said the court then will decide if it needs to redo Reid’s preliminary hearing.

Reid was dismissed from the K-State baseball team Jan. 12 but retained his scholarship and financial aid.

2 Columbine students killed in sandwich shop shooting

By R. UNRUH

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLETON, Colo. — Two Columbine High students were found dead early Monday after a shooting at a sandwich shop within sight of their school, compounding the heartbreak in the community that suffered the worst school shooting in U.S. history.

The bodies of Nicholas Kunselman, 15, and Stephanie Hart, 16, were discovered inside the Subway shop where Kunselman worked. Investigators did not disclose a motive but ruled out murder-suicide.

Jefferson County sheriff’s spokesman Steve Davis said the cause of death had not been determined, and he said he did not know whether a weapon had been found. Investigators were reviewing a videotape from a surveillance camera inside the restaurant.

“I hope it was just a robbery,” said one of Kunselman’s co-workers, J.J. Hodack, 22. “I’ve had more than enough of this. This stuff needs to stop.”

The shooting was the latest in a string of tragedies that have hit the Denver suburb since teen-age gunmen Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold killed 12 students and a teacher at Columbine on April 20 and then committed suicide.

Classes remained in session Monday, but at least 100 students stayed away. Students said some of those who did attend could be seen crying in the hallways. At least 25 counselors were kept busy most of the day, said Betty Fitzpatrick, health services director for the school district.

“It reminds me of everything. It’s just like flashbacks,” said Nathan Vanderau, an 18-year-old senior who knew some of the victims of last year’s shooting as well as Monday’s victims and is in counseling.

Among the other incidents that have added to the unease in the community:

■ In October, the mother of a student partially paralyzed in the massacre shot herself to death.

■ On Feb. 1, the body of an 11-year-old boy was found in a trash bin within blocks of the school. No arrests have been made.

■ Last week, a Florida man pleaded guilty in Denver to sending a Columbine student an Internet message threatening to finish the massacre. The threat prompted officials to close the school for the Christmas holidays two days early. He faces up to five years in prison.

Friends said Hart enjoyed sports but was quiet and didn’t go out much except to stop by the sub shop to see Kunselman. He had worked at the sub shop for only a month but had won the manager’s confidence and often was assigned to close the restaurant at 10 p.m., Hodack said.

“Obviously, our boss trusted him. He’s a good worker,” he said. A Subway employee driving past the store noticed a light inside the store about 1 a.m. Since the business was supposed to be closed, the woman stopped, went inside and discovered the bodies. As investigators worked inside the shop about two blocks from the high school, Columbine students and relatives of the victims gathered in the parking lot, placing bouquets just outside police lines. They also wrote chalk memorial messages.

“Every week, there’s something

“It’s horrifying to me. We are not getting it done. We are not protecting the people of the state.”

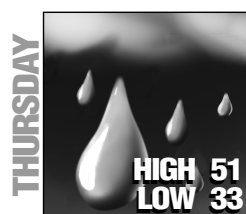

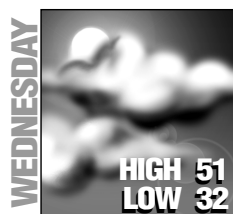

— Ken Gordon, Colorado House minority leader that happens here,” said Daniel Baker, who brought three friends to deliver flowers. “This is supposed to be a normal community.”

Courtney Scott, Hart’s 18-year-old cousin, placed a heart-shaped bouquet of flowers with a banner reading, “I love you,” outside the shop. She said Hart was not at Columbine the day of last year’s shooting. A school spokesman confirmed both victims attended Columbine last year but did not know if either was there when the massacre occurred.

News of another shooting in Littleton resonated in the Statehouse in Denver, where the House debated gun restrictions that were drafted in part because of the Columbine massacre.

“It’s horrifying to me,” said House Minority Leader Ken Gordon, a Denver Democrat who sponsored some of the measures. “We are not getting it done. We are not protecting the people of the state.”

Former senator's aide drops sexual harassment charges

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A former senior aide to Sen. Max Baucus has dropped a legal claim that the senator fired her after she rebuffed his sexual advances.

The Montana Democrat, in a statement Monday, said the decision of former chief of staff Christine Niedermeier to abandon the case backed up his assertions that her accusations were completely false.

"I have never harassed her or retaliated against her. These are the facts, and that's the truth," he said.

Niedermeier said she was telling the truth but had decided that she could not afford the emotional and financial toll a lawsuit would take.

Niedermeier, 48, made her complaint last September to the Office of Compliance, an independent legislative agency created in 1995 in the wake of the sexual harassment scandal that forced former Sen. Bob Packwood, R-Ore., to resign.

Under the 1995 act, the office provides mediation and a hearing process and gives the employee 90 days after mediation efforts end to file a claim in federal district court. That 90-day period ended Feb. 7.

Niedermeier had charged that Baucus, 58 and married, had made repeated sexual advances during the 15 months she was chief of staff and Baucus had fired her last August for rejecting those advances.

Baucus said he fired her because her abusive treatment of staff affected office operations.

Niedermeier, in a statement, indicated she turned down a Baucus offer of money and the prospect of a job in exchange for recanting her accusations. She declined to offer details, citing confidentiality requirements of the settlement process.

"My integrity is intact," she said. "I will not lie about what I believe to be the true reasons for Sen. Baucus' termination of me, in exchange for any amount of money or the prospect of a job."

But Baucus' lawyer, Jean Manning, said Niedermeier's statement was false and that her decision not to file her claim proved the senator's innocence.

"We think he's been totally vindicated by her choice not to pursue the claim," Manning said.

She also disputed Niedermeier's statement that she was forced to abandon the case because of costs. Manning said Niedermeier could have opted for an Office of Compliance administrative procedure where there are no legal costs, but the remedies are the same as for a court case.

Fish-blending art exhibition unplugged by Danish police

COPENHAGEN, Denmark — The art display at the small museum in western Denmark features 10 goldfish, each swimming in its own blender. The catch: Each blender can be turned on, depending on the viewer's whim.

The display, which opened Friday, has caused outrage among animal rights activists and drawn unusually large crowds to the Trapholt Art Museum. Two fish were blended at the opening, and police ordered the plugs pulled after a local group, the Union for the Protection of Animals, complained.

Museum director Peter Meyer said five more fish were blended Sunday. Five surviving fish also were stolen from their blender aquariums over the weekend, but the museum replaces the goldfish to maintain the original work of art, Meyer said.

Police Sgt. Poul Henning Christensen said an investigation was under way, and museum organizers could face fines if they disregarded orders to cut off the power to the blenders.

The museum in Kolding, 125 miles west of Copenhagen, is one of many smaller art exhibitors in the Nordic country. It draws about 80,000 visitors each year. This weekend, though, it had 1,000 curious visitors — a high off-season number, Meyer said.

"I'm glad for all the publicity, because people now come in and see the whole exhibition we have at the museum," Meyer said.

He said he had not expected such interest — nor that people actually would turn on the blenders, a move that requires flicking on a main power switch as well as that on the individual blender.

Animal rights groups have fumed at the museum and the publicity it has received over the exhibit. They say that even if the blenders aren't turned on, the fish still suffer from a lack of oxygen or vegetation.

Do they all lead to the same place?

Some people say the world's religions represent many roads, all leading to the same God. Can this be true? Religious traditions such as Islam and Buddhism differ significantly from one another, and we should take these differences seriously, appreciating the uniqueness of each view. Embracing one religion means excluding the others -- so how do we make an informed decision?

Hall, Hoskinson 1st to announce candidacy for high office

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

“Students for students” will be the focus of presidential running mates Steve Hall and Ryan Hoskinson, who officially announced their candidacy for student body president and vice president Monday.

Hall, junior in agricultural economics, and Hoskinson, senior in education, kicked off their campaign with an announcement at the clock south of Hale Library. Hall said they hope their slogan, “Students for students,” will bring the focus of student government back to academic concerns such as advising, graduate teaching assistants and additional state aid for the university.

These three issues will be the heart of the Hall-Hoskinson bid, Hall said.

“It’s important to get behind organizations like the University Task Force for Advising, because we don’t have enough accountability for advisers,” Hall said. “There are some advisers that don’t make the job a high enough priority between classes and research.”

Hoskinson said some advisers are unfamiliar with the students they are meant to assist as well as the students’ graduation requirements.

“The advisers need to know that, for some students, it’s important to get out in four years,” he said. “I know some students that could have graduated on time if their advisers had been on their toes and helped them get into the classes they needed.”

Additional requirements for students hired as graduate teaching assistants also would be an important point for them if elected, Hoskinson said.

“This is a touchy subject, but something needs to be done,” he said. “Some of these GTAs are coming in with no teaching experience and are not willing to put in the extra time for their students.”

The Legislature’s cut of the education budget and subsequent tuition increases led to Hall and Hoskinson’s third platform issue, Hall said.

“Wefald does a good job of representing the university as a business, but something really has to be said about the student viewpoint,” he said. “The extra $70 we’re going to pay for school next semester is a lot of money for college students.”

The renovation to the K-State Student Union is nearing completion with the opening of the Cats' Den Monday.

New specialty retail shop now open for business in Union’s north side, will offer extended hours

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While many people opened gifts on Valentine’s Day, the K-State Student Union opened the doors to its new specialty retail shop, the Cats’ Den.

The store is located inside the Union on the first floor and has two entrances — one from inside the Union’s north entrance, and the other on the south wall of the store, leading to the east/west concourse.

“We offer a variety of stuff,” Stephanie Wedel, cashier for the store, said.

The store offers items and services such as film developing, greeting cards, K-State novelties, food and beverages.

“It’s kind of a combination between health and beauty needs, food, beverages and supplies,” said Cindie Snyder, Union marketing and promotions manager. “Just quick grab-and-go items.”

While the store has most of its supplies, it still is awaiting the arrival of various items. By the end of the week, it should have hot dogs, nachos, self-serve bulk candy and a frozen-beverage machine.

Wedel said the store has been busy on its opening day but expects more business toward the end of the week.

“I think people don’t realize that we do offer more stuff because it’s not all in now. It’ll probably get busier at the end of the week,” she said.

The store is open from 7 a.m. to 10 p.m. Monday through Thursday, 7 a.m. to 11 p.m. Friday and Saturday and noon to 10 p.m. Sunday.

Snyder said the store will stay open later than other Union stores to accommodate students on campus at night.

“There’s quite a few people on campus for night classes and in labs, and we wanted to fill that need,” she said.

Snyder said not only did the hours and product lines make it original but so did the design.

“One thing that sets it apart is its visual effect,” Snyder said. “It probably has the most modern design of anything we’ve had during this renovation.”

Bernard Pitts, Union executive director, said they chose The Ken Ebert Design Group to develop the design for the store. He said the Cats’ Den would provide another convenient and quality service for K-State’s campus.

Snyder said all of the Union’s stores are important, but the Cats’ Den is a valuable addition with its informational services and variety of products.

“The Cats’ Den just helps round out the offerings,” she said.

Strip mall will bring benefits to Manhattan

A strip mall is just what Manhattan needs.

A Chicago-based developer will present a plan Tuesday night to the Manhattan City Commission that could clear the way for a strip mall to be constructed on the city's east side.

The mall would be built in the quadrant now bordered by Tuttle Creek Boulevard, Bluemont Avenue, Fourth Street and Leavenworth Street.

Although the exact details of what the group has in mind are not yet clear, there already has been some community backlash. This stems from the fact that the new mall would require residents of the area to be moved before demolition.

It certainly is sad that residents and business owners in the area would be moved, but the city will do all it can to make sure all of these people receive a fair deal. The time has come to push out the old and move in the new.

The area is one of the most rundown sections of Manhattan. Rather than waste time and money making insignificant improvements, the city needs to drastically overhaul the section, and a strip mall seems a wise course of action.

In addition to improving the area aesthetically, and possibly attracting more consumer activity to this part of town, the new mall would present an opportunity to improve the spotlight mess in the area.

The situation at the intersection of Bluemont and Tuttle Creek — combined with the Bluemont and Third Street intersection — is enough to push any driver to the brink of insanity.

It is rough when people will be forced to move. But the city will do its best to guarantee the best possible deal to everyone involved.

Sometimes, for the betterment of all, some people will be inconvenienced. They will not be left homeless or have their businesses taken away but simply will be relocated.

The time has come to improve Manhattan's east side, and support for the proposed strip mall is the best way to guarantee that improvement.

Personal choice plays role in alcohol intake

Editor,

In reading Scott Roney's article about alcohol-free residence hall options, I feel some clarification should be made.

His driving evidence for this initiative at K-State is from Derek Jackson, who stated that — at least once a week — an ambulance visits the residence halls for alcohol-related incidents. This is my sixth semester in Ford Hall, and Karrie Mitchell, Ford Hall assistant resident life coordinator, said every time the ambulance has been called to Ford in the past year, it has been due to drinking outside of the residence hall. From my experience during the past 2 1/2 years as a community assistant and resident, I would have to agree.

I have seen women hauled out of Ford on stretchers, and it is not a pretty sight. I also saw these same women stumble in the front doors after a wild night outside of the residence halls. To truly combat the alcohol abuse problem at K-State, an initiative needs to be taken where the problem really exists. Go to the source of the abuse — a lack of personal responsibility.

Maybe substance-free zones should be an option within the residence halls, just like Ford had a limited visitation option on one wing, where men were not permitted between midnight and 8 a.m. This morning, this option officially ended by a unanimous vote by the women on that wing.

In addition, Roney says people choose to live in substance-free living environments, but apparently there are no numbers for the increased grade point average or reduced dropout rate of the students in this option.

If the time truly has come for substance-free options in the residence halls, I'll see Roney at the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls meeting at 9 p.m. Wednesday in the Union Big 12 Room.

Thinning hair. Thinning bank accounts. Thinning ozone layer. Such is life.

Life is a concept that is completely susceptible to influence. Influences function as a means for human beings to coordinate their lives and develop their personalities. Developing a personality is essential to becoming an individual, but some influences are not good for young and influential people.

Now, I am not going on a Marilyn Manson rant here. Nor am I going to hit on issues such as the Columbine shooting and soft porn available on cable shortly after 10 p.m. I thought maybe I would hit on a negative issue that begins with the wholesome American sitcom, "Friends." In particular, the female characters of "Friends."

It is no secret that Rachel has gotten thinner. It is no secret that Monica has gotten thinner (although I tend to wonder from time to time: why David Arquette? Is he different when they are alone as opposed to his public behavior? Do not take this the wrong way — I find him hilarious).

Let's flip on over to "The Practice" and take a painful look at Lara Flynn Boyle. While she might have Jack Nicholson at her side, she is rather hard to find when looking at her from a side view. I find that a bit strange considering she probably spent a couple of thousand dollars on the dress she wore for that publicity photo, in which she is indistinguishable. Why would someone want that kind of press?

And I could not forget to hit channel six and catch "Ally McBeal." Calista Flockhart also seems to have disintegrated away from the TV set. She must have to shop at the Baby Gap version of Dolce and Gabbana. I wonder how they design clothing for a 30-something woman who wears a size 6X?

As I said before, thinness is in. Like an Old Navy tech vest, looking like a wisp of air with jutting collarbones is trendy. But why thinness the way it is now, in the year 2000?

It must be the influence of the media, movies, magazines, male and female opinion and the fashion industry. Maybe it is time that someone besides People magazine and E! Entertainment Television acknowledges that this has become a problem that is influencing the college-age generation.

That college-age generation would be us here at this university, and yes, I believe this is a problem, more than it was five years ago. I believe all of the mega-stars of America losing weight on high protein, low carbohydrate diets is an influence. I believe being thin is being put into our heads as being the only way to be happy.

A study done in North Carolina took 1,226 college students, male and female, and gave them an Eating Attitude Test. The results of this test showed 23 percent of women and 8 percent of men tested 20 points above the norm. Twenty points over the norm indicates an eating disorder.

Further, 80 percent of the women and 20 percent of the men said they were terrified at the prospect of becoming overweight. I think being scared of gaining weight is not something new, but so many of the people surveyed during this study were aware of this being an issue in their lives. Something like No. 3 or 4 on their what-not-to-do-in-my-life list.

Now, here is a statistic that has to surprise you.

Another study I read about indicated that more college women have eating disorders than the entire teen-age generation of today. In the past 20 years, eating disorders have gone up 30 percent for college women. Teenage girls' eating disorders only have gone up 10 percent in the past 20 years.

How is that for shock value?

Women my age are struggling more with their weight than any other women on this planet.

Women my age are influenced vastly by television, movies, magazines and the fashion industry.

Women my age are losing weight and destroying their bodies that have the potential of being more healthy than they ever will be the rest of their lives.

Thinness is in, and we all are so trend-driven that this has taken off faster than a Michael Jordan Nike commercial makes an advertising firm very rich.

I don't know how to cure this. I don't know if this will go out the door those awful stone-washed jeans were thrown out of. I simply wish to cause some extra awareness if you read this and feel that you are succumbing to this trend.

I do know that the thinning of America and the rest of the world is going to have to come off the racks with all of those puffy vests we have all been wearing this winter. I just hope the thinning trend does not just get replaced with something that comes in a lighter, more colorful form for spring.

Despite sin of homosexuality, Phelps' tactics should change

We've all seen him and the circus he brings to town whenever he visits. Accompanying him is a faithful entourage of men, women and children who flock to support his cause.

His name is the Rev. Fred Phelps of the Westboro Baptist Church in Topeka. Wherever he goes, a bright yellow sign sporting the slogan, "God Hates Fags" is sure to follow.

Phelps claims to be a Christian and often quotes scripture to support his arguments. He shows up at parades, funerals, street corners and college campuses to preach the gospel.

My only question is: what gospel is he preaching?

He taunts the families of AIDS victims by picketing their funerals. He shows up at college campuses to show his disapproval of the sexual preference of the person giving a speech or lecture. Basically, if an event is homosexually related in any way, Phelps probably will be there.

If Phelps thinks he is a Christian, it is obvious he has become so wrapped up in his own agenda he has forgotten what being a Christian is all about — carrying out the great commission of Christ.

The great commission is Christ's commandment to go out into the world and bring people to him.

The only thing Phelps' campaign has accomplished is making Christians look bad and turning people away from the truth.

Honestly, why would anyone want to be a Christian if their first encounter with one was listening to a loud-mouth hatemonger like Phelps?

If you look at the lifestyles and tactics of both Phelps and Jesus, there are no obvious similarities.

Jesus was quick to give glory to his father in heaven.

Phelps, armed with offensive signs and brainwashed zombie followers, seems to be interested in doing nothing but bringing attention to himself.

Jesus showed forgiveness to anyone who accepted him as Lord. In the Book of John, the Pharisees wanted to stone a woman who had been caught in adultery. Did Jesus picket the woman's house and bring public attention to her sin?

No. Jesus simply said, "If any one of you is without sin, let him be the first to throw a stone at her."

Phelps, just like the Pharisees, is so eager to find fault in others he fails to recognize different people struggle with different things, and his sins are no less severe than anyone else's.

Despite the fact that Phelps lacks a general understanding of the teachings of Christ, there is one concept he clearly grasps — homosexuality is a sin.

Proponents of homosexuality can argue all day that same-sex relationships are OK, but if you take a Biblical perspective — this simply is not true.

According to Romans 1:25-27, "They exchanged the truth of God for a lie, and worshiped and served created things rather than the Creator — who is forever praised, Amen. Because of this, God gave them over to shameful lusts. Even their women exchanged natural relations for unnatural ones. In the same way the men also abandoned natural relations with women and were inflamed with lust for one another. Men committed indecent acts with other men, and received in themselves the due penalty for their perversion."

In I Corinthians 6:9-10 it states, "Do you not know that the wicked will not inherit the kingdom of God? Do not be deceived: Neither the sexually immoral, nor idolaters, nor male prostitutes, nor homosexual offenders, nor thieves, nor the greedy, nor drunkards, nor slanderers, nor swindlers will inherit the kingdom of God."

Thankfully, there is an 11th verse: "And that is what some of you were. But you were washed, you were sanctified, you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and by the spirit of our God."

Homosexuality is sinful and wrong, but what Phelps doesn't understand is God forgives homosexuals — if they repent, accept Jesus as Lord and flee from that lifestyle.

Instead of damning homosexuals to hell, maybe Phelps should take the plank out of his own eye before he looks at the speck of sawdust in his brother's eye.

Better yet, maybe he should picket himself with a sign that says "God Loves Everyone — Even Confused, Hypocritical Fools Like Me."

GTAs become eligible to receive university's insurance benefits

By SARAH SOURK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Graduate teaching assistants at K-State administer tests, teach classes and now are able to apply for health insurance from the university.

The 1999-2000 academic year marks the first time that K-State graduate teaching assistants and graduate research assistants are eligible to receive insurance benefits.

John Struve, budget director, said the issue probably dates back to June 1997, when K-State requested permission for funding for GTAs and GRAs.

Struve said nothing happened during the 1998-1999 year, so the request was resubmitted in June 1998, and the legislature approved the funding for the 1999-2000 academic year.

When it was submitted in 1998, Struve said the form included graduate teaching assistants, graduate research assistants and graduate assistants.

Kelli Cox, assistant director in planning and analysis, said after the bill was passed through the Legislature, though, graduate assistants were not listed.

Jennifer Gehrt, associate director of the Division of Human Resources, said that to be eligible for health insurance, GTAs and GRAs must have a half-time position, which equals at least five-tenths employee credit.

Until this year, K-State GTAs and GRAs only were credited with four-tenths employee credit, eliminating them from receiving health insurance.

Gehrt said the changes were made for the purpose of helping the GTAs and GRAs receive health insurance.

The health insurance was implemented Sept. 1 and will run through Aug. 31.

"If people have problems we need to know because we rebid for the new health insurance," Gehrt said.

The health insurance program is organized through the state.

All universities have the same plan with the same insurance company, so K-State does not have direct involvement in choosing the insurance company.

The insurance plan is created by Student Risk Managers and is underwritten by the Gerber Life Insurance Company.

Under this plan, K-State pays for a portion of the insurance for the GTA or GRA, Gehrt said.

GTAs and GRAs have two levels of insurance from which they can choose: basic and comprehensive.

When the program started in September, 120 basic plans and 86 comprehensive plans were issued.

As of December, 167 GTAs were using the basic health insurance package, while 107 were enrolled in the comprehensive, Gehrt said.

The number of GTAs and GRAs enrolled in the insurance program has increased monthly since the insurance was first offered, Gehrt said.

"The increase of students is due to the amount of awareness and the need to pick up health insurance," Gehrt said.

K-State looks to fill vacant positions after lift of 90-day hiring prohibition

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State for the past 90 days could not fill jobs funded by the state general fund.

In response to statewide budget cuts, Gov. Bill Graves enacted a hiring freeze in November.

Now the 90-day hiring freeze is over, positions are ready to be filled, and K-State is ready to hire.

Finding the employees might not be that simple.

"The number of applicants was half of what it was two years ago," Gary Leitnaker, director of human resources, said.

"With the low unemployment, there are not a lot of people looking for work."

Leitnaker said there has not been a large rush of applicants to fill the positions.

His biggest problem was trying to find people to fill the positions.

"We plan to catch up for positions that weren't filled during the freeze," Leitnaker said. "The positions we are now advertising for are the most we've had in one week."

The state 90-day hiring freeze ended Feb. 2, allowing K-State to fill a number of needed classified positions.

The 24 full-time positions the university needs to fill are maintenance, technical (computer), office and clerical positions, Leitnaker said.

The freeze did not include administration or faculty.

"Part-time help picks up some of the slack," Leitnaker said. "But it is very rare for students to apply for full-time positions."

The governor imposed the hiring freeze as part of his 1 percent budget cut in response to shrinking state funds in November 1999.

"We can now go back to normal operating conditions with the hiring freeze being lifted," said Don Brown, press secretary for Graves.

The hiring freeze was enacted because there wasn't much direction about how to cut costs, Brown said.

The exact dollar amount saved by the hiring freeze is unknown at this point.

At the end of the fiscal year, a figure should be known, he said.

However, many positions were exempt from the freeze.

Jobs of crucial need, such as direct medical care, health care, public safety and law enforcement were spared because of necessity, Brown said.

"There were a limited number of options the governor had in order to cut costs," Brown said. "He found the hiring freeze to be the most prudent option."

Individual performances highlight meet

■ Women's team proves successful in Nebraska.

By NICK BRATKOVIC

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With an increased level of competition at the Husker Invitational last weekend, the K-State track and field women's distance medley relay ran a time of 11:20.11 and won the event.

The team of Korene Hinds, Amy Mortimer, Amanda Crouse and Rachel Woods barely missed automatically qualifying for nationals by 11 hundredths of a second.

The performance was a bright spot in the Cats' day, K-State head track and field coach Cliff Rovelto said.

"The really good things were the distance medley relay team," Rovelto said. "One of the more significant things on the medley was Korene Hinds ran quite a bit faster than she previously did. She set the tone for the whole thing."

The distance medley is a race in which each of the four team members run a different length. Rovelto also said Woods had a strong performance.

The Cats, Rovelto said, also had strong performances on the women's side from Erin Anderson, who competed in the high jump and pole vault.

In the high jump, she finished second and set a personal record in the event. Rovelto said the results can be deceiving.

"She was going back and forth in between the pole vault and high jump," Rovelto said. "That was a little bit distracting. The final pole vault final result doesn't look as impressive, but she is getting closer to where jump consistently at around 13," Rovelto said.

In the women's weight throw, Rovelto said he was happy with senior thrower Anna Whitham's performance.

"Whitham in weight was outstanding, and she had a personal by 1 foot," Rovelto said.

"Historically Anna has come on, performed and had her best performances at the meets that are most important. She performs well at conference and the national meet when she has been there," Rovelto said.

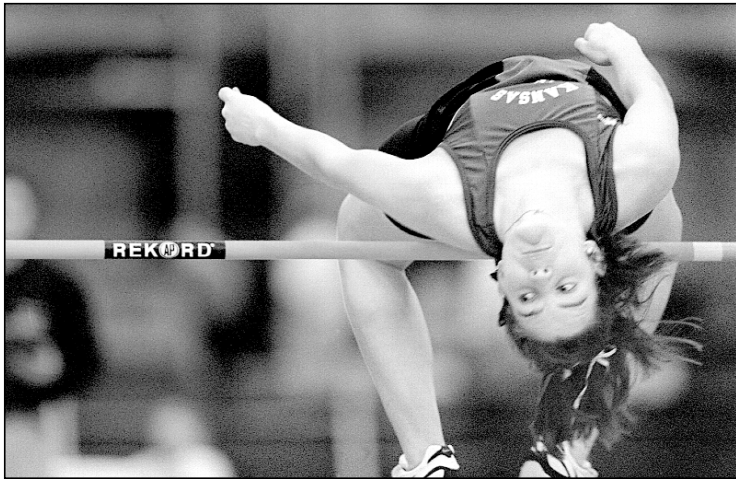

"That's just Anna — I am sure that last season wants to do as well as she can down the stretch."

On the men's side, Rovelto said the team didn't have many athletes at the meet, but he said they still put forth strong performances.

Justin Robinson finished seventh in the long jump with a jump of 23-04.50. Rovelto also said thrower Tamel Sisney had a tough meet.

"Tamel had a tough meet — he was so-so in the weight," Rovelto said. "But he is someone who has always stepped up when it mattered most. Again we didn't have a whole lot of bodies there on the men's side."

The Cats' next meet, the KSU Open, will be at 1:30 p.m. Wednesday at Ahearn Field House.

Women's crew takes 2nd place

■ Training in offseason pays dividends in year's 1st meet.

By DEREK BOSS

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After training hard in the off-season, the K-State women's crew team opened the spring 2000 season with a second-place finish at Saturday's Indoor Rowing Championship in Lawrence.

Although the host Jayhawks took first in the eight-team field, compiling 72 points, the Wildcats' 35 points were good enough to post a tie with Creighton University for second place.

K-State head coach Jenny Hale said the off-season training helped the team, and she said it will determine the squad's success this season.

"The winter conditioning sets the stage for how well the athletes will row in the spring," Hale said. "With the Indoor Rowing Championship, we are really testing the quality of their winter training, and we use the results to set some preliminary lineups for the spring boatings."

K-State rower Laura Pavlyak said the team's dedication during the winter will prove beneficial this season.

"I think it will definitely pay off," Pavlyak said. "We've been working hard. Everyone's pushing each other, and I think we'll definitely see results when we get back on the water."

In the collegiate varsity event, three K-State juniors turned in top-five times.

Emily Benz posted a second-place time of 7:20.8, with Pavlyak finishing a close third at 7:21.6. Missy Darnell added a fifth place in the simulated 2,000 meters with a time of 7:24.9.

"We were very pleased with our performances," Pavlyak said. "Seventy-five percent of our team reached their PRs (personal records), so we had some of the best times we've ever pulled."

In the relay competition, K-State's "A" boat finished in 6:40.1 for second place, while the "B" boat tallied fourth at 6:43.2.

"The relay event, although it is a good way to get points, it is really the fun part of the day," Pavlyak said. "We had a good time. It was a good way to top off the day."

The Cats also saw success in the novice/freshman event.

Kelli White and Amy Herrmann finished in sixth and seventh place with times of 7:39.5 and 7:40.4, respectively.

The Cats will begin the 2000 sprint season on March 12, when it plays host to the Creighton Blue Jays at Tuttle Creek Reservoir in Manhattan.

"We just take it one race at a time," Hale said. "Creighton is a building program, but we're right on track. We feel good coming into that race with the numbers we had last weekend in Lawrence."

A new BALL GAME

BY MICHAEL NOLL

Women's guard learns Division I ropes, steps up to bring in wins for Wildcats

The fortunes of the K-State women's basketball team have mirrored the play of its point guard April Sailors.

When the Trinity Valley Community College transfer, who led her team to the national title last year, has played well, the Cats have won. But the opposite is also true.

Now the Cats are on a two-game winning streak, but during K-State's recent five-game losing streak, the 5-foot, 5-inch guard saw her turnovers increase. Conversely, her assists and minutes decreased, a situation Sailors said was frustrating.

"I feel like I have to be a leader," Sailors said. "I was trying to figure out what I had to do, and then I tried to do too much."

The cause of these misfortunes, Sailors said, was the difficulties she experienced grasping the K-State system. Division I basketball, she said, is much different than the community-college style of play.

"It's just so much more team oriented here," Sailors said. "Junior college, I would say, was a lot of street ball. That's where I think I learned that concept of just taking over and doing something."

As a result of the habits she learned at Trinity Valley, Sailors has struggled to play in the capacity K-State coaches expect. The junior point guard said she focused too much energy on show-stopping plays.

"When things weren't going right and coach said we needed somebody to step up, I would try to step up, but I didn't know the proper way to step up," Sailors said. "My way of stepping up was trying to dribble in and do everything when stepping up just meant making a good pass, making a good, open shot within the framework of our offense."

Sailors struggles in learning to play within a definite framework should not have been surprising, K-State head coach Deb Patterson said.

"When a junior-college player is making the transition and coming in, they are like a freshman," Patterson said. "You walk into a game that's faster, it's more physical, your defenders are bigger and the system is extensive on both ends of the floor."

Despite her struggles, Sailors recently has shown signs of feeling more comfortable on the floor. Coming off the bench in the Cats' last contest, a 69-63 win over Iowa State, Sailors scored nine points on 3-for-6 shooting from three-point range and ran the offense more effectively.

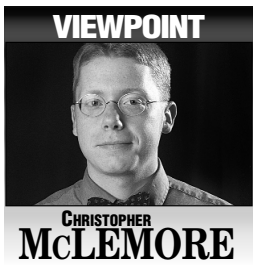

Sailors credited her shooting and effective play to simply relaxing on the court.

"When you're not relaxed and you're trying to do too much, everything just gets so frustrating, and you just don't feel under control on the court," Sailors said. "But when you can go out there and feel really relaxed and just make sure you do the right thing, you're going to get open."

Trinity Valley Community College transfer April Sailors, who led her team to the national title, has helped the K-State women's basketball team to a two-game winning streak.

Baseball stadium, fishing records provide food for thought in lieu of football

A funny thing happened on the way to the Big 12 Conference cellar.

The K-State women's basketball team drained 12 three-pointers on its way to an upset victory over No. 8 Iowa State.

Now we've got a reason to put football on the back burner at least for another month or so. With that being said and a month and a half before spring football begins, here are my thoughts concerning random issues in the sports world.

I've got a quick question. What's worse: losing in the first round of the postseason NIT or not even getting invited? ...

Never before has a golf player made so much noise by placing second in a PGA tournament. Tiger Woods' second-place finish to Phil Mickelson in the Buick Invitational was an abrupt end to his six game PGA tour winning streak.

The surprising thing is not Tiger's loss but the fact that golf experts actually were entertaining the thought that Tiger could break Byron Nelson's record 11-tour winning streak.

In an era where the PGA tour is solid from top to bottom, Nelson's record might be the most unreachable sports record outside of Joe DiMaggio's 56-game hitting streak. ...

Let's clear up something about the Ken Griffey Jr. deal: Griffey is not on a "higher moral ground" because he took less money in Cincinnati than he was offered by other teams. When you make as much money in endorsements as Griffey does, you can afford to take a few million less in your paycheck.

Honestly, Junior is a multimillionaire. Yes, he did take less money than he could have, but he got the privilege to play exactly where he wants to next season, and he gets to play for a postseason contender.

Don't even begin to think the Mariners got a good deal in the Griffey trade. The Mariners got two decent players and two questionable ones. The loss in ticket sales alone will be a problem for the Mariners, not to mention the fact that they lost a living sports icon. ...

Is anyone else embarrassed every time they drive by Frank Myers Field? I can't believe the K-State baseball team can spend an entire season without a home field and then come back this season to a home field that makes you want to spend all of your games on the road. ...

In NFL news, the rumor mill says that New Orleans Saints' rookie coach Jim Haslett might be looking to unload Ricky Williams to help fix the mess created by Mike Ditka. If I were Williams, I'd have a lot of faith that my agent Master P would line up one heck of a trade deal. ...

The K-State men's basketball team's chances to keep the 54-year home winning streak alive comes down to three home games. If the Cats can win any of the remaining games, they finish the season with a home winning record. The problem is that two of the teams left on the home schedule are Missouri and Texas. The other team is Texas A&M, a team with a poor record, but one that was actually able to beat Colorado.

I guess the good news is we finally have a reason to pay attention to the games. ...

Ted Williams, the greatest hitter ever to pick up a baseball bat, is now one of the greatest fishermen ever. He recently was inducted into the International Game Fish Association Hall of Fame. Few can claim to be inducted into one hall of fame, let alone two.

It's often said that Williams mastered the three hardest things possible for a human: hitting a baseball, catching fish and flying a fighter jet. No doubt, Williams is one of the greatest athletes of all time.

While Williams has lost most of his vision, his ability to walk and much of his good health, he hasn't lost his respect or his absolute love for sports. That might make Williams more admirable than all of his sports records combined.

City officials debate living-wage proposal

■ Plan not finalized yet, but commissioners show interest in ordinance.

By JASON BECK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Flint Hills Living Wage Coalition has prepared a proposal for a living wage in the city of Manhattan that has been met with mixed reviews.

The Living Wage Coalition, started in February 1998 by K-State assistant professor of philosophy John Exdell and other activists, defines a living wage as the amount of money a person must earn to pay for all the necessities of life.

This includes health insurance, food bills, electrical bills and the cost of raising a child.

Their proposal, which has yet to be finalized, would require companies receiving public economic development funds to pay a stipulated minimum wage.

A similar bill in the Kansas Senate also has sparked debate. Gov. Bill Graves has endorsed a bill that would raise the minimum wage statewide, which, at $2.65 an hour, is only higher than Wyoming's.

There have been attempts to tie the bill with another that would prevent local governments from passing their own wage laws, like the Living Wage Coalition wants to do in Manhattan.

Many members of the Manhattan City Commission are in favor of looking into this proposal, although nothing has been finalized.

Commissioner Bruce Snead is in favor of the proposal as a criteria for deciding what firms get public money from the Manhattan Economic Development Opportunity Funds Advisory Board.

"The living-wage criteria is worth considering as one of many for economic development investments," Snead said.

Snead said although he is in favor of looking into the proposal, it is not without its drawbacks. Snead said there is fear that it will affect the local job market negatively. There were fears it might drive up local wages, especially since Manhattan's unemployment rate is so low at about 3 percent, he said.

"We don't want to just add jobs at any price," Snead said. "If we're going to invest tax money to create jobs, we want to add jobs that are substantial and provide jobs that will allow people to support their families."

Not everyone is so open to the idea of a mandated living wage. According to the proposed ordinance, employers would have to pay a full-time minimum wage of $8.45 an hour for employees with benefits and $9.28 an hour for employees without benefits.

The Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce is against any such restrictive ordinance, said Anne Harts, vice president and director of economic development for the Chamber.

"We oppose an ordinance or a mandatory wage because it raises the bar artificially," Harts said.

Harts said the Chamber of Commerce does support the living wage idea but said wages should be determined by the marketplace and not by government mandates.

"We want to increase wages in our community," Harts said, "but this would reduce Manhattan's effectiveness in the global marketplace."

Harts said wage increases should come about through the free market and long-term skill development.

"Wages should be determined by skill and abilities," Harts said. "Our goal would be to continue using the free market system."

Pat Alexander, president and chief executive officer of Security National Bank in Manhattan, also said the proposal by the Living Wage Coalition is misleading and is broader than it sounds.

Alexander said the proposal defined any company that received public funds as a Community Economic Development Assistance Recipient. But, Alexander said, any company with 10 or more employees that provides contract work to a CEDAR, also is a CEDAR.

This much broader definition, living wage

This proposal defines a living wage as the amount of money a person must earn to pay for all the necessities of life, which include health insurance, food bills, electrical bills and the cost of raising a child.

Alexander said, applies the ordinance to services, like Manhattan water services, phone services, bank and legal services, trash services and city maintenance services, just to name a few.

"I think it's extremely anti-business," Alexander said. "As a result of an unfriendly environment, fewer jobs would be created."

Alexander also said the market should determine wages. He said he fears that this ordinance will create undue burden on the city, which will have to create a separate group to enforce the policy.

Alexander said he feels the ordinance is unnecessary because wages have gone up $1-$2 an hour.

"The marketplace has been adjusting wages," he said. "It would be the ultimate in Big Brother."

video exercise

Tae-Bo, other home-exercise videos more beneficial when added to regular workouts

STORY BY REED DUNN

Trends in exercise have changed with the increasing popularity of home-exercise videos, such as Tae-Bo. Laura Williamson, senior in nutrition and exercise science and fitness consultant at Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, said exercise videos can provide positive results if used correctly. She said using the videos in addition to exercising at a gym would be the best idea.

"I would say if they are used on a regular basis, they can give results," she said. "It wouldn't be as effective as working out in the gym. I would use them as a supplement to add variety but not as your main source of exercise."

Robin Leaper, assistant director of aquatics and building operation, said understanding the exercise process is important before selecting a video to use. She said proper safety is important with any type of exercise program.

Taking an aerobics class is one way Leaper said students can be made aware of proper stepping and other safety issues. She said the Rec Complex has beginner aerobic courses to teach basic steps and safety issues. The classes are offered at 3:15 p.m. each Monday and Wednesday and are free to anyone who has Rec Complex privileges.

"If students do use video tapes, I would urge them to do that with a live instructor," she said. "I don't think I've ever seen a video talk about safety cues."

Nicole Dautel, senior in kinesiology and aerobics instructor, said safety definitely is the key issue and being able to ask instructors about technique is important. She said when she teaches classes, she walks around and helps students maintain good technique.

"Tapes can be good as long as the person knows the safety," Dautel said. "But if you're there, you can ask a question. We walk around and make sure people are being safe when working out."

Techniques on proper lunges, squats and stepping on and off of equipment are some of the movements Dautel said aerobics instructors watch.

Williamson said she recommends students use home exercise videos and vary the tapes and topics covered in each to achieve the best possible workout. She said students would benefit the most if they did research before purchasing one specific video.

"You would have to vary the videos, because you won't get a total body workout just using one tape," she said. "I would look for one that would give you a total body workout and one that would give you a complete routine."

Molly Miller, freshman in secondary education, said she uses the advanced Tae-Bo video to keep flexible and toned. She said she didn't begin with the first tape in the Tae-Bo series because she felt she was able to handle the next level.

"I started off at intermediate because I had danced all through high school," she said. "I don't like to lift weights, and this has helped keep me flexible and toned."

After becoming familiar with the Tae-Bo series in high school, Miller said she is comfortable with the style of workout Tae-Bo offers. She said the series of tapes leads up to an intense workout and is probably not appropriate for just anyone. She said she is very comfortable with the tapes, but Tae-Bo might not be the right routine for everyone.

"I think you should do what you feel comfortable with," she said. "I think people are doing Tae-Bo now because it's trendy, but if you can't keep up with it, you should look into lower intensity exercise."

Health QUESTION

By: Elaine Gonsior

Physician at Lafene Health Center

Q: How do you know if you have asthma, as opposed to other breathing problems?

A: Asthma is diagnosed by a physician. Here are some situations that might indicate you have asthma:

1. If you experience reduced exercise tolerance, shortness of breath, coughing or wheezing starting 10 minutes (or longer) after exercise with improvement 30 minutes after exercise.
2. If you suffer from recurrent bronchitis or recurrent pneumonias, especially if the diagnosis occurs during the times respiratory problems are not prevalent, or if current news reports of pollen counts are reporting active pollen and you have nasal allergies but treat them inadequately or not at all.
3. A persistent cough without wheeze can be a sign of cough variant asthma — this is not usually a self diagnosis.

Students deal with loss of parents' insurance

By CASSIDY HILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Getting kicked off of your parents' health insurance can be a problem. Students approaching graduation or their 21st birthday should check to see if they still will be covered under their parents' plan.

Rebecca Swan, senior in English literature and women's studies, said she was removed from her parents insurance when she turned 23.

She said it was a shock, and she would have benefited from planning ahead.

"Most seniors don't think about getting health insurance until they have been removed from their parents health plan," Swan said. "I just recently turned 23, which meant that I was removed from my parents insurance plan. I think most students take their parents' health plan for granted, and it is definitely an eye opener when it's gone, because you have to go out and get a plan of your own."

Every health insurance agency is different and has its own guidelines. In order to plan ahead after graduation, students need to check with their parents to find out the age requirement that is necessary to still be under their parents' plan. Some insurance agencies don't cover children when they reach 21, others continue coverage to 23 or even 25 years of age.

Most health insurance plans have dental, mental, pharmacy, orthodontic and maternity coverage.

Although everyone can purchase health insurance, there are pre-existing conditions that might cause a person to have a lengthy waiting period or pay a higher cost.

Pre-existing conditions are long-standing conditions that affect a person's health, such as asthma or any other extended medical problems.

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotions at Lafene Health Center, said in order for students to plan ahead, they need to look at a Web site that includes all health insurance agencies along with their individual options.

"There is a great Web site that has all the information senior students need to know when they look into health insurance," Kennedy said. "www.hiaa.org is the Web site that is very useful in finding out the different options each plan has to offer."

Some insurance agencies have a high-risk policy that might limit some activities in which a person can participate.

A certain health plan might not cover pilots, bull riders and sky diving.

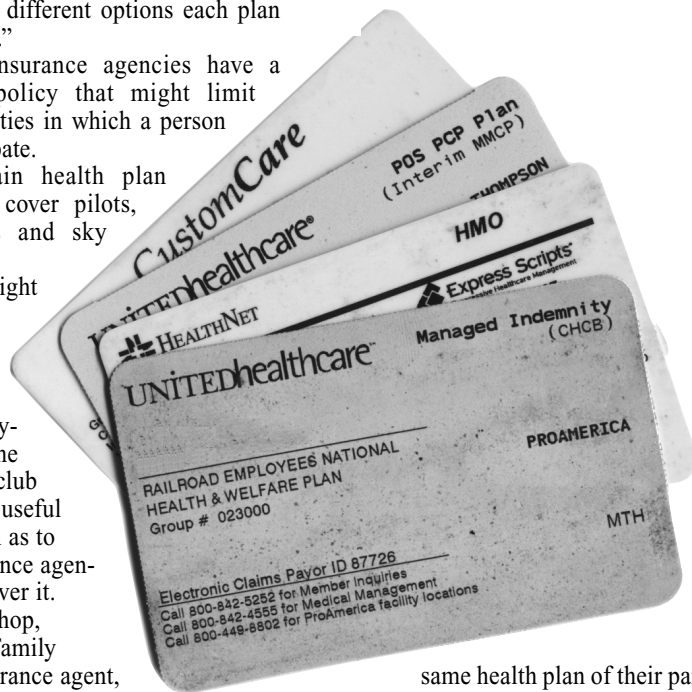

Pilots might be able to get health insurance through their employers, while the sky diving club might have useful information as to what insurance agencies will cover it.

Bob Bishop, American Family Health Insurance agent, said insurance through an employer is less expensive than if bought on one's own.

"Some students don't follow the same health plan of their parents," Bishop said.

"They can get the same plan cheaper and have benefits through their employer," he said.

You will burn fat, improve your fitness level and increase strength and stamina. (Mondays at 5:30 p.m. and Thursdays at 6:30 p.m.)

Body Sculpting
Tone and strengthen your muscles using weights, bands, tubes and balls. This class is an excellent addition to Cardio Express. (Tuesdays and Thursdays at 5 p.m.)

Cardio Express
A class of just aerobic conditioning. Low impact and step aerobics are mixed to give you maximum calorie-burning activity. A short workout with BIG results! (Tuesdays at 5:30 p.m. and Wednesdays at 7:30 p.m.)

Easy Yoga
Easy stretches and yoga postures plus breathing and relaxation techniques designed to reduce stress, build strength and improve flexibility. All fitness levels are welcome. (Tuesdays at 7:30 a.m. and Thursdays at 11 a.m.)

Gentle Exercise
Slow, gentle stretching and range-of-motion exercises to help participants stay active and independent. Ideal for people with balance problems, or for those who have difficulty walking. (Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays at 11 a.m.)

KidFit
A children's fitness program teaching lifetime healthy habits, basics of eye-hand coordination, social interaction, teamwork, exercise and nutrition — with lots of fun! (Preschool: Wednesdays at 3 p.m.; grade school: Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays at 3:45 p.m.)

Lifetime Fitness
Get fit for the 21st Century! Strengthen your muscles, improve your flexibility and increase your balance with this age-defying workout. Appropriate for all adults. (Fridays at 9 a.m.)

Moms in Motion
A class for pregnant and postpartum women. This class consists of low impact aerobics, resistance training and stretching — all geared toward the pregnant woman's changing body. A physician's referral is required. (Mondays and Wednesdays at 6:30 p.m.)

Seniorcise
Low impact aerobics performed to music will condition your heart, followed by resistance training to strengthen. Geared toward "seniors," but all ages are welcome. (Mondays and Wednesdays at 9 a.m.)

Seniorcise Express
A shortened version of Seniorcise. (Mondays and Wednesdays at 8:15 a.m. through March.)

Sit and Be Fit
Cardiovascular aerobic movements all done in a seated position. Lessen the impact on your joints as you condition your cardiovascular system. Resistance training and stretching conclude this energetic class. (Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays at 10 a.m.)

Strengthen and Stretch
Strengthen and stretch your muscles using weights, bands and tubing. Most exercises are done seated in a chair. (Tuesdays and Thursdays at 10 a.m.)

Step-n-Sculpt
The best of step aerobics and body sculpting in one class. Alternate four minutes of step with one minute of sculpting to give you a complete workout. (Mondays at 7:30 p.m. and Wednesdays at 5:30 p.m.)

Weekend Workout
Start your weekend right! Class will be taught by a different instructor each week. Watch the bulletin board in the exercise classroom to see who's teaching. This workout may include low impact aerobics, step aerobics, body sculpting, intervals, kickboxing and circuit training. (Saturdays at 9 a.m.)

Tai Chi
Come discover the benefits of this ancient Chinese system of exercise based upon calm, graceful movements that condition the body from the inside out. With rewards like increased flexibility, reduced stress and anxiety and improved concentration, Tai-Chi is the ultimate form of exercise for relaxing and strengthening both body and spirit. This class is designed for a variety of fitness levels. (Thursdays at 7:30 a.m. starting Feb. 3.)

The Yoga Workout
A more intense yoga class designed to strengthen and improve stamina. This class is for fit individuals and is not recommended for those with back or joint problems. (Thursdays at 5:30 p.m.)

Total Body Conditioning
Are you interested in participating in a form of exercise practiced by some of the world's most famous bodies (among them Madonna, Julia Roberts, Patrick Swayze and Sharon Stone)? If you answered yes, Total Body Conditioning is for you! This intermediate to advanced level class incorporates the deep muscle toning techniques of Joseph H. Pilates and ballet to create the longest and leanest muscles possible. (Fridays at 5:30 p.m. starting Feb. 3.)

Zone Yoga
An intermediate class with more advanced postures and stretching than those done in Easy Yoga. Designed for strength, flexibility, toning and total well-being to keep you in the Yoga Zone! (Tuesdays at 6:30 p.m.)

$20 per month for unlimited classes.
Memberships to our Fitness Centers are also available.
Mercy Health Center offers a variety of exercise classes for all ages and fitness levels. Classes are ongoing; join anytime! Classes listed run through May 26. All classes are held at our Sunset Avenue facility.

For information or to register for classes call Mercy Health Center at 587-5485.

Pentagon’s chief weapons tester warns defense secretary about missile system

By ROBERT BURNS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Pentagon is moving too rapidly toward a recommendation to President Clinton on whether its national missile defense project is ready for deployment, the Pentagon’s chief weapons tester said Monday.

In a report to Congress and Defense Secretary William Cohen, Philip E. Coyle, director of testing and evaluation, questioned Cohen’s plan to review the project’s status in June. On the basis of that review, Cohen is to make his recommendation to the president on whether to move ahead with deployment.

The schedule for a June review, puts unrealistic pressure on the project’s managers, Coyle wrote.

The system, as envisioned by the Pentagon, would use a network of radar and silo-based interceptor missiles to detect, track and shoot down long-range ballistic missiles outside the Earth’s atmosphere. Congress has required the administration to deploy such a system as soon as technologically feasible.

Noting that Cohen so far has said he intends to stick to the June timetable, Coyle wrote that “undue pressure has been placed on the program to meet an artificial decision point in the development process.”

So far there have been two tests of the system’s ability to intercept a target missile in space. The first, last fall, was successful. The second, in January, was not.

The next test — scheduled to be the last before the June readiness review — is unlikely to take place before mid-May, although no firm date has been set.

In light of the failure of the January test, Coyle said, more time should be allowed for analyzing the results of the next test before Cohen makes his recommendation to the president. He did not say how much more time was needed, but the analysis normally takes two months.

Thus if the next test were in May,

If the system is deployed in 2005 as called for in the current schedule, the total cost, including development, production, construction and operating it for 20 years, would be $26.6 billion.

the review in preparation for a recommendation to Clinton would not be done before July.

“This would provide a clear technical understanding of the results and avoid forcing the (readiness review) before the analysis is complete,” Coyle wrote.

The Pentagon has budgeted $12.7 billion for the national missile defense project during the next five years. Coyle’s report says that if the system is deployed in 2005, as called for in the current schedule, the total cost — including development, production, construction and operating it for 20 years — would be $26.6 billion.

5 people killed in western Missouri shooting

By CHRISTOPHER CLARK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WARRENSBURG, Mo. — Four children and a woman were shot to death at a farmhouse in western Missouri, and a man was taken into custody Monday.

In addition, two girls from the same family as the other victims — one an infant, the other 3 years old — were taken to Western Missouri Medical Center and were later transferred to another hospital for treatment. Officials said they were expected to survive.

The relationship of the man was not disclosed.

“Everybody who’s been out there looks like they’ve been to a war,” said Pat Leighter, a dispatcher for the Johnson County Sheriff’s Department. She said the sheriff had carried one of the bloodied survivors into the hospital’s emergency room.

She said all the victims were shot with some kind of rifle.

Leighter said the sheriff’s office received two 911 calls about 8:35 a.m. — one from inside the house, another from a neighbor — about some type of disturbance at the home.

When authorities arrived, they took the man into custody. Charges were pending against the man, who was not injured, Leighter said.

The shootings occurred in a rural, heavily wooded area off a dirt road about four miles east of this university town. Sheriff’s cars guarded the driveway leading into the property Monday afternoon as chickens and geese roamed across the yard.

LEARNING THE TRAILS

STORY BY KELLY EVENSON

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/COLLEGIAN

Leah Kroencke, senior in animal science and industry, lunges a horse during Advanced Horse Training class Tuesday night.

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/COLLEGIAN

Randy Raub, associate professor of animal science and industry, gets ready to help Lisa Dolton, senior in animal sciences and industry, bridle a horse during Advanced Horse Training on Tuesday evening at the Horse Teaching and Research Center. The class meets four days a week, and students spend close to two hours a day working with the horses.

Students learn details of horsemanship through class experience

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/COLLEGIAN

Todd Wright, senior in animal science and industry, rides out to the pasture to work a horse Tuesday evening.

Riding horses is like being on top of the world, Heidi Kautz, junior in animal science, said.

She said it feels like flying. Since about 1990, students in Advanced Horse Training class have been participating in a program that allows them to ride horses, but more importantly, gives them the opportunity to learn how to train and communicate with them. The result is participating in a horse auction in March where they sell the animal with which they have been working.

The sale, March 11 at the Kansas Cowboy Arena, is designed as a completion of what the students have learned about both communicating with a horse and the dynamics of a horse auction, said Randy Raub, associate professor of animal science and industry.

"The students are learning to work with a horse and then getting that animal ready for a sale, learning the dynamics that are involved in the process," Raub said. "The class is about getting along with horses and continuing that knowledge with them through life as they work with other animals."

Raub said students learn about communicating with their horses as they learn about themselves during the process. He said students start horses on their saddle in the beginning and then work to bring them along to more advanced training exercises.

"They learn things in regards to the patience you must have working with an animal like that and trying to work and train with the horse," Raub said.

Kautz said most of the students in the class begin training their horses during the fall semester and continue working with them through the spring. She said the students work on things such as leading, listening and lunging with the individual horses.

After the horse becomes familiar with the basic exercises, it moves to the arena or square pen. She said the horse will learn to be in a situation with other young horses, as well as more about the surrounding environment and what

City accepts initial plan for east-side development

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Negotiations for a shopping center advanced Tuesday night as the Manhattan City Commission entered a pre-development agreement with developers interested in the 35-acre plot between Leavenworth Street and Bluemont Avenue.

Murmurs passed through the audience as commissioners voted unanimously to give First National Development Ltd. exclusive rights to work with the city in the area.

"Why should we continue with this agreement?" Commissioner Bruce Snead asked the audience. "Because of the potential it holds for us, for the entire community. It is our intent to have you involved all the way."

Since First National appeared at the commission's Jan. 19 meeting and proposed to build a shopping center in the area, the idea has had its critics.

One such critic was Tracy Weaver. "My question is, 'What is sacred about developing in this area?'" he said. "I would rather see development in the northwest area where the population is increasing."

The project also would destroy affordable housing, he said.

Another opponent of the plan spoke indirectly. Joe Knopp, a local lawyer representing two landowners in the area, said a developer with no competition has absolute freedom when trying to buy from the current owners.

"Without knowing the price, it's a little difficult to see if we're killing the golden goose or avoiding being stepped on by an elephant," he said.

Under the new agreement, the city agrees

Former pitcher's scholarship lost after dismissal

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former K-State baseball pitcher Brett Reid lost his scholarship after he was dismissed from the team in January.

Reid is facing charges of attempted rape and aggravated sexual battery that allegedly occurred Oct. 30 and a separate charge of attempted rape that allegedly occurred Oct. 2.

Tom Gilbert, assistant sports information director, said the university stayed with Reid until the charges were serious enough that he had to be dismissed from the team.

"We don't want anyone to think that athletics condones that behavior," he said.

Gilbert said Reid is no longer in school, and he also lost his financial aid.

Jack Taylor, assistant director of student financial assistance, said students would not lose their financial aid due to charges against them.

"Charges are not enough for us to take federal aid away from a student," he said.

Students can lose aid if their academic progress doesn't meet the standards by the university or by the federal government, they aren't taking enough hours, if they owe money to a federal aid program or if they are no longer students, Taylor said.

He also said a drug conviction can prevent a student from receiving financial aid.

Filing deadline draws near for Student Governing Association elections

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The deadline for students to apply for a Student Government Association position is 4 p.m. Friday. Forms can be dropped off in the Office of Student Activities and Services on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union.

Travis Morgan, elections chair, said so far things seem to be looking good for the 2000-2001 elections.

"We've got people bringing in their forms quite regularly," he said. "But we know that Friday is going to be the big day."

Morgan said he didn't have an idea yet of the number of people who had filed so far.

After filing forms have been checked to make sure the candidates meet the qualifications, the next step in the election process is for candidates to attend mandatory informational meetings about election regulations.

Morgan said putting the elections online is coming along fine, too.

He said there will be an icon on the K-State home page that students will be able to click on to start the process of voting, and that he thinks voting will be similar to buying football tickets online.

"There are still some bugs to work out," he said. "Things could change at the last minute, but for now that's kind of where things are going."

Morgan said anyone who is enrolled as a K-State student should be able to vote in the elections, including students on the K-State-Salina campus.

Salina students will vote on a university-wide ballot, which includes the student body president and vice president, and a ballot for their college Senate seat.

"Salina should be totally integrated with the system," Morgan said. "There won't be any questions like last year."

Jason Heinrich, student body president, said he encourages students to run.

He said running for a position is good experience, and even the students who lose learn the ins and outs of a process that can help them for the next election.

"If you go in with a good attitude and don't put all your marbles on winning and concentrate on having a good experience, winning doesn't matter," Heinrich said. "There's a lot of different things you can learn and grow from."

If students have questions or complaints about violations, Morgan said they can e-mail them to election@ksu.edu. They can pick up election packets in the OSAS.

Star football player posts bond, awaits murder trial

ATLANTA — Football star Ray Lewis was released from jail Tuesday after posting $1 million bond and is free to return home to Maryland while awaiting trial on murder charges.

Surrounded by sheriff's deputies, Lewis stepped into a waiting BMW and pulled away from the Fulton County Jail with his lawyers, his mother and his fiancée. He made no comment.

Lewis' lawyer, Ed Garland, said the NFL linebacker would spend time with his family in Atlanta, then return home today to Baltimore.

Garland called Lewis' release on bond step one.

"Step two is to get an acquittal," he said. "I never expect him to set foot in a jail again, unless it's to do charity."

About 90 minutes before Lewis left jail, co-defendant Reginald Oakley arrived there to turn himself in. A third suspect, Joseph Sweeting, turned himself in Monday.

Lewis and his two co-defendants are charged with murder in two stabbing deaths during a brawl at a post-Super Bowl party on Jan. 31. Lewis, 24, had been held without bail since the day of the slayings.

The bond requires Lewis to stay in Maryland unless he is traveling to Georgia for court appearances or to meet with his lawyers and doesn't permit him to visit Florida, where his fiancée and two of his children live.

The judge imposed a gag order on all parties in the case.

Various NFL figures, including Baltimore Ravens owner Art Modell, testified for Lewis during his bond hearing, calling him dependable and a good citizen.

Superior Court Judge Doris Downs said she found no evidence that Lewis, who has no felony convictions, poses a significant threat to flee the charges or to intimidate any witnesses.

Downs required that $200,000 of the bail be in cash and said Lewis cannot consume alcohol or drugs while he is out. She also said Lewis must be home every night before 9 p.m.

Lewis' lawyers say he tried to break up the fight and was at least 60 feet away when the victims were stabbed.

Gonzalez sends Reno letter demanding return of his son

HAVANA — Increasingly frustrated by his son's extended stay in the United States, Elian Gonzalez's father has sent Attorney General Janet Reno a letter demanding the boy be returned to him right away.

Juan Miguel Gonzalez's second letter to Reno in as many weeks was published Tuesday in Cuba. In the letter, Gonzalez says he does not recognize the jurisdiction of the U.S. court system, which is weighing an attempt by 6-year-old Elian's Miami relatives to block his return to Cuba.

"I formally object to the legal moves made or being made by those who are arbitrarily retaining Elian," Gonzalez said in the letter, dated Monday and published on the front page of the Communist Party daily Granma.

Elian has been the focus of an international custody battle since he was rescued Nov. 25 from an inner tube off the Florida coast. The boy's mother and 10 other people died when their boat sank en route from Cuba to the United States.

Elian is staying with his paternal great-uncle Lazaro Gonzalez, who is fighting to keep the boy with him in the United States. Cuban exiles in Miami say the boy's mother died to give him freedom in the United States; the Cuban government maintains Elian is being kept improperly from his father.

Lawyers for the relatives in Miami filed a brief Monday in federal court, arguing the Immigration and Naturalization Service cannot return Elian to Cuba without having a political-asylum hearing.

U.S. government lawyers have moved to dismiss the Miami relatives' suit, arguing that they have no legal standing in the boy's case. The INS ruled last month that only Elian's father has the right to speak for the boy in immigration matters.

In his first letter earlier this month, Gonzalez pressed Reno to return the boy to him. He said that in the meantime, his son should be placed with Manolo Gonzalez, another great-uncle in Miami. Manolo has said he supports the child's return to Cuba.

"I am deeply concerned and anguished over the present condition of my 6-year-old son, Elian Gonzalez, unfairly and cruelly separated from our family for over two months," the father wrote in his first letter.

Topeka news. The state doesn't belong in the business of returning weapons seized from drug dealers to the streets, an official from Gov. Bill Graves' administration said.

Dan Hermes, Graves' governmental-affairs director, spoke for the governor's bill during a House Federal and State Affairs Committee hearing Tuesday.

Current law requires the Department of Revenue to sell weapons seized for taxes owed, some from drug raids.

Graves' plan ends state-sanctioned gun sales. The department would get firearms appraised and apply that amount against taxes owed.

The Kansas State Historical Society would get first crack at weapons for historical significance. Then, law-enforcement officials who seized weapons could get them back. Barring those scenarios, weapons would be destroyed.

During fiscal 1998, the department sold 54 handguns and 177 long guns, netting Kansas about $38,000. No weapons since have been sold.

Jeremy Claeys, junior in mass communications, and Amy Metzinger, sophomore in agricultural economics, announce their candidacy for student body president and vice president next to Anderson Hall on Tuesday morning. The polls will open March 6 and close 5 p.m. March 8.

Claeys, Metzinger declare decision to run for student body presidency

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Six. That is the number of items on Jeremy Claeys and Amy Metzinger's list for their "Leadership That Works" campaign.

The student body presidential running mates announced their candidacy Tuesday afternoon north of Anderson Hall.

They said their No. 1 priority is creating a three-year tuition freeze to counteract the tuition increase.

"We want to try to really get some money back here at K-State," said Claeys, junior in electronic journalism and political science.

He said students are paying 33 percent of their education's real cost, compared to the 25 percent students paid in the 1960s.

"We've seen the government plan 10 years down the road for highways," he said. "There is no reason we can't plan for this three years down the road."

Metzinger, sophomore in agricultural economics, said Claeys approached her after winter break and suggested they run together.

"We felt very similar about a lot of issues," she said. Another issue they said needs to be addressed is the issue of parking on campus.

They've looked at Heinrich's research and said the follow-up costs of a shuttle system would equal the costs of a multi-level garage.

"We need to look at a bold solution for this problem," Claeys said. "I just don't see why we don't solve the problem right now."

He said they want to make the garage look like a hall on campus so they could find alumni donors and name it.

"We want a funding solution that doesn't involve students except for a minimum maintenance fee," Claeys said.

Their next issue addresses minority students.

"A lot of minority students don't feel like they're represented, and you really can't argue with them," Claeys said.

To solve this problem, they want to create a student government committee that will give minorities a place in Student Senate to voice their concerns and encourage them to be part of the community, he said.

Another issue they said Claeys and Metzinger feel strongly about is the expansion of KATS.

There is no limit to what can be included, as long as it's feasible, Claeys said.

"We want to try to make campus virtually accessible," he said.

They will get students' opinions on how KATS should be expanded through campaigns and meetings with organizations, Metzinger said.

The last two issues include a privilege fee review and the installment of flashing yellow lights for pedestrians on Anderson and North Manhattan avenues.

The reason for a privilege fee review is simple, Claeys said.

"We want to make sure that every dollar we spend is accounted for," he said.

Dana Pracht, junior in education and personal development (left), and Jake Worcester, senior in agricultural economics, announce their candidacy for student body president and vice president Tuesday afternoon between Holtz and Denison halls.

Worcester, Pracht proclaim run for SGA's top elected positions

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Jake Worcester and Dana Pracht have a vision for K-State.

They want to see this vision come true by becoming K-State's next student body president and vice president. The pair announced its candidacy for the offices Tuesday afternoon.

"We have to keep making improvements and serving students," Worcester, senior in agriculture economics, said.

Worcester and Pracht said they want to focus on three main areas where they would like to see improvements made at K-State.

The first area is academic quality.

"Every person at K-State should have the opportunity to succeed," said Pracht, junior in life science and psychology.

In order for students to succeed, Worcester and Pracht said advising needs to be better.

Worcester said K-State has taken steps to make academic advising better but more needs to be done. He said advising skills need to be an important part of promotion and tenure considerations.

The second area in which they want to make improvements is technology advancement.

"In order to receive the best education today, students should have the best technology at their hands," Worcester said.

Worcester and Pracht said they would like to see an Internet authentication system that would allow access to online library resources from off-campus and residence hall computers.

They also would like to expand the services of KATS, including being able to request transcripts through KATS instead of having to go to the Registrar's Office to fill out forms and pay $5.

Worcester and Pracht also said they support increased computer lab access, and that they would like to see laser printers in campus labs rather than dot matrix printers.

The last area in which Worcester and Pracht said they want to focus is student life.

They want to push for a student activity center that would be an addition to the K-State Student Union and would house the Student Governing Association, Greek Affairs, multicultural organizations, Union Program Council and other student organizations. Pracht said the center would provide interaction between all student organizations, rather than separating the groups across campus.

Worcester said he and Pracht also want to develop the Consumer and Tenant Affairs office further. He said they would like to create a guide that would be available in hard copy and online for off-campus housing. The guide would include addresses of available housing options in Manhattan and their prices. Worcester said this guide would be good for both landlords and tenants.

Worcester said students can find out more about their campaign platform by going to www.ksu.edu/jakeanddana.

"We feel really good about these issues," he said. "They're tangible, we can accomplish them, we can push for them and they put students first."

Students should run for elected positions

The moment of truth is approaching.

Friday will be the day that separates the students who only want to sit back and complain about the actions of their student government from the students who want to get involved and attempt to affect change in that government.

Students with an interest in campus issues should run for office, whether it be for the executive branch, Student Senate or the College Councils. Student Governing Association offers a tremendous learning experience if those elected truly strive to represent their constituents.

While having experience in governing usually is preferred, most officers would agree that understanding SGA procedures can be learned rather quickly. The best leaders are those who have a passion for what they are doing. Don't let your lack of know-how be the only excuse for not running.

If you do run, be aware of the tough task ahead. Most students either don't care about student government or disapprove of the job being done.

Last year's SGA elections featured record numbers of candidates. This turnout has led to a Senate filled with some of the most capable students on campus. If SGA hopes to continue to have the best aboard, it must have high turnout once again.

Anyone who wants to file for election should not waste time. With only a few days remaining, opportunities are running out.

The deadline is 4 p.m. Friday in the Office of Student Activities and Services, on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union.

The next generation of leaders should not necessarily have solutions for all campus problems but at least should be willing to speak their minds.

Blue is for violence, red is for Cupid. Valentine's Day is so stupid.

A little comment about Title IX compliance: Since the women have a basketball team, when do the guys get one?

On behalf of women's basketball, we'd just like to say thank you to all the sororities and fraternities and all the student athletes who came and supported us in our big win against Iowa State.

What's up with the weak editorials this semester? You might as well fill the space with even more Campus Fourum.

I think they should take away one day out of spring break and just open up campus to shoot squirrels.

People who call the Fourum are a bunch of dorks.

Hey, Coach Asbury, why don't you resign so that we can get some real players on the team, and we can have pride in wearing our purple again?

For once I finally agree with Scott Roney. The alcohol situation in the dorms is ridiculous.

I think instead of making the residence halls alcohol-free, we should make the Collegian Roney-free.

Why should I go to the Cats' Den and pay 15 cents more for a bottle of Dr Pepper when I can get one out of the vending machine for a dollar?

We need to lay off the Collegian staff and start bashing the Greeks again.

If we're going to get rid of Tom Asbury, we might as well go after Steven Henson.

Is it me, or is hazing getting worse and sanctions getting less costly?

To get Asbury out of K-State, just stop going to the games. Wait, that hasn't worked for three years. Never mind.

I think they should start serving beer at Bramlage. That sure would ease the pain of watching our team play.

I just realized why I never played Division I basketball: I went to Tom Asbury's basketball camp when I was little. Thanks a lot, Tom.

Kudos to Scott Roney. He showed there is diversity in his journalism.

Monday's paper was great. The women's basketball team got front-page coverage. Now get the Fourum on the front page, and we'll be happy.

Run, STUDENTS, Run

K-State cannot be represented by only motivated few

"The death of democracy is not likely to be an assassination from ambush. It will be a slow extinction from apathy, indifference and undernourishment." — Robert M. Hutchins

This is the time of year that either gives you an adrenaline rush like a gallon of vanilla cappuccino, or a skull-splitting headache like ... well, that gallon of cappuccino one hour later.

Yeah, just as we're hitting our stride into the spring semester, it's election time for the Student Governing Association and, statistically speaking, you probably don't care less. I say this because traditionally, voter turnout on campus is, well, "dismal" doesn't quite do it justice anymore. Apathy seems to have a sleeperhold on SGA elections, but there's never been a better time to change that than now.

In the years I've been on campus, voting's been an oddly challenging task for me. It's a trial to remember to vote immediately after a class when I'm hungry, thirsty, tired and my inner monologue consists of whimpering and begging to go home. Then there's the matter of getting in line, and filling in that ballot that brings back memories of standardized testing. Voting's never been all it's cracked up to be. For an American institution, there should be a way we can jazz it up a tad.

Voilà. Now we can vote from home.

One of Student Body President Jason Heinrich's platform issues, Internet voting, became a reality earlier this year. Now, instead of toying with No. 2 pencils, students can log onto KATS and vote. Yes, you now can vote in the nude. We couldn't do that five years ago. Just trust me. This change introduces several new cans of worms (which I hope will remain unopened after elections), but when it comes to battling voter apathy and low turnout, it's certainly a step in the right direction.

Voter apathy, though, still can settle in. There's a tendency to see SGA members in general as a bunch of résumé-packing Machiavellian backstabbers holed up in the Union and voted back into office by housemates every year. This same tendency is among those who call Greeks a bunch of paddle-happy GHB-packing binge-drinking Abercrombie-and-Fitchers. Maybe one bad apple doesn't ruin the whole bunch in this case, but it sure does make it stink.

Call it the streetlight phenomenon — we don't notice the thousands of streetlights we pass underneath that stay lit, but when one goes out when we pass, we remember that one, don't we? You can have a thousand positive, upstanding examples, but one idiot ruins the whole show.

Therefore, it must be eliminated. I'm not calling for the indoctrination of Ken's SGA Death Squad. Not this semester. I need some more sleep, and besides, my scythe's in the shop. No, the best way to make SGA more representative of the students is to elect those willing to act on the best interests of the students — not SGA, not a résumé, not someone else's agenda, but 20,000-odd students who have nothing in common aside from attending this university. But you'll be surprised how easy it is for the most inexperienced, unqualified people to get elected when nobody else runs.

So I want you to run. Yeah, you, with the paper (Don't look around. I'm everywhere. You can't escape).

Look, you don't have to string or staple posters to every tree from Nichols Hall to Washington County. You don't have to whip up uninvited campaign slogans or lame puns based on your name. Just get your name on the ballot. Voters cringe inside when they see they can vote five times for four candidates. It just hurts. So don't let it happen this year. You don't need an agenda; you don't need a horde of housemates. I don't care what your qualifications are. If you've got the time to give to SGA, give it a roll of the dice and let the voters decide if you're worth it.

If you're interested — and you should be — swing by the Office of Student Activities and Services in the Union. It's down by Union Station, near the postal scale by the ATMs. Or, if you're still stoked about this whole Internet-voting gig, drop an e-mail to election@ksu.edu. You can apply to run for Student Senate, one of the College Student Councils, the Board of Student Publications, Fine Arts Council, Union Governing Board or, for the particularly adventurous (or exceedingly masochistic), student body president/vice president. Elections are March 6-8, but the filing deadline is Friday. Check it out. Give it a look. You'll meet a lot of good people, people trying hard to do a good job for the people of K-State. You can be one of them. SGA can get better, but who are you going to trust to make it happen? Them or you? Get out there and represent.

Student finds hope in Sister Souljah's message of racial coexistence

GUEST VIEWPOINT

HALL

Sitting on stage listening to motivational speaker Sister Souljah, I looked around and noticed more than 250 faces gathered in and around the Union Courtyard to hear her speak. The lecture itself was so powerful and intense I literally tried to relate every word said with what I am doing or have experienced in my own life.

What caught my attention first were the obvious differences between traditional African culture and the culture in the United States. According to Souljah, in traditional African culture, "I" means "we," while in American culture, "I" means "I." However, although things from one continent exhibit some differences, a deeper look shows there also are many strong similarities.

As an African-American student, university life often seems to be an uphill battle. Although a lot has changed throughout the centuries during this struggle, the actual life of an African-American student continues to be filled with extra pressures that the majority student population might never face or understand.

When we come to campus, it is with the understanding that we have overcome our first hurdle as an adult; simply put — just plain getting here. This accomplishment comes with the knowledge that this automatically leads to our next two hurdles: staying in college and graduating.

I feel that as an African-American student I have to work twice as hard as the majority. I know that society has labeled my race as slow and not capable of learning at the same pace and level as the majority, but that is all the more reason for me to give 150 percent when others are giving 100 percent.

What makes it necessary for minority students to give more? Well, first let's look at basic survival in the classroom. In order to survive in the classroom, you need to adopt good study habits, and this often requires establishing and participating in study groups. As an African-American student, finding people to whom you can relate and actually are willing to study with you is often problematic.

Second, surviving in the academic setting of the classroom is different from surviving in the social realm of a university. I remember reading an article concerning the way African-American students seem to disassociate themselves in public areas like dining centers and the Union Food Court. This presents a positive as well as a negative.

Positively, in keeping with the words of Souljah, this is indicative of our need to be part of a "we." In coexisting with each other, we are better able to watch out for each other and make sure that, once we have made it, we continue to reach out a helping hand to others to ensure that they make it as well. Negatively, this means that we often deepen the schism that already exists between different groups.

If I walk away with anything from Souljah's speech, it is the sudden realization that the "I" also can be representative of the separation of racial and ethnic groups. Somehow, we have to find a way to make this carryover from traditional African culture a "we" as well. This is something I hope we can all do. In continuing with this year's Black History Month theme, I hope we can find a way or make a way for this to happen.

READERS write

Column reminds reader of pro-slavery argument

Editor,
Jeff Elliott's column detailing the biblical justification of homophobia is reminiscent of the pre-civil rights sermons of certain Southern ministers on the status of the black population of America.

Citing such passages of the Bible as Exodus 21 and Genesis 9, these ministers pointed to the divine sanction of slavery and invoked the "curse of Ham" as an indication that God had meant for the African to live in servitude to God's chosen people. Now, Elliott does not strike me as a person who sympathizes with the institution of slavery, nor do I feel he would think less of his fellow men or women because of the color of their skin.

Despite his devout Christianity, I doubt he would find a biblical defense of racism particularly convincing. Why, then, should a biblical defense of homophobia find in Elliott such a willing convert?

Excess criticism not fair to men's basketball team

Editor,
I am writing this in regard to all the students that have called in and complained about the men's basketball team.

I am a former manager of the team and follow it closely. I have been in practices, in the locker room and in the timeout huddles, and I know what the coach's philosophy is and what the members are trying to achieve with our team.

As far as the Fourm goes, none of those who call in ever have played Division I basketball in the Big 12, and therefore, they have no right to talk about the team like a bunch of basketball experts. Although I have had my differences with the coaches, I assure you I would never question their ability to do their job well.

If these people want to continue to write or call in these messages, you should at least limit the amount of them you print until you know the facts about the coaching staff. Tom Asbury and his staff deserve some credit.

Columnist shouldn't push biblical beliefs on others

Editor,
I am writing in response to the column by Jeff Elliott in Tuesday's Collegian. Actually, I would like to comment on numerous columns that have been in the Collegian lately.

For the past month or so, the readers have been bombarded by the various columnists about what our opinions should be on various issues, the most prominent of which is, of course, abortion. It seems every columnist takes every single thought in their head straight out of the Bible. Well, whether you want to admit it or not, Elliott, some of us do not pattern our lives after the Bible. There are many people in this world who believe in a different power, and there are those of us who choose not to believe in any higher power.

Now, for our sake, please stop telling us how we should live our lives. One of the great aspects of America is that we are free to think how we choose. I have no problem with a person who does not agree with homosexuality or is pro-life. But, I do not want to have their opinion forced upon me. I do not try to force my opinions on others, and I wish that everyone could respect this opinion. I am not a homosexual, but if someone happens to be, I have no problem with that. I do not judge someone strictly on their sexual orientation.

Everyone who is against homosexuality points out that it is a choice on the part of the person. Now, even though there is no scientific evidence of a gay gene, does anyone really believe that a man (or woman) simply wakes up one day and says, "Hey, I think I'm gonna be gay"? Homosexuality is no more a choice than heterosexuality. I do not remember waking up one morning in sixth grade and proclaiming to the world, "I am a heterosexual man, and now I want to find a woman!" I just found myself attracted to the opposite sex.

Elliott has a good idea in pointing out the shortcomings of Fred Phelps' tactics and beliefs, but then he points out in his column that "homosexuality is sinful and wrong." Your Bible might state this, but what about those who do not follow it? Are they not entitled to their own opinions?

I guess if you pattern your life after that Bible, you cannot make any of your own choices anyway, right, Elliott?

—Shaun Rucker sophomore in management information systems/marketing

Elliott misinterprets text of Bible in latest column

Editor,
So is Jeff Elliott, who disapproves of Fred Phelps but says "Homosexuality is sinful and wrong ..." trying to be a kinder, gentler version of Phelps?

Sounds like it to me, but I am not at all sure that he is kinder and gentler than Phelps. He insists that homosexuals deny who they are and pretend to be what he thinks they should be. Such a demand is cruel, not kind.

I believe each of us is created in God's image. That includes homosexuals. Who is Elliott to say that God made a mistake in creating a person who happens to be homosexual?

In some cultures, homosexuals not only are accepted but prized for their gifts. They do seem to earn more due to their talents than the rest of us.

Among the Kuna Indians in Panama, mothers feel particularly blessed to have a homosexual son. Personally, I prize the artwork of one of those sons.

The Bible means different things to different people, and many scholars believe any perceived condemnation of homosexuality in the Bible is the result of misunderstanding and incorrect interpretation.

We humans really know little and have no business pointing fingers at homosexuals as if they are particularly sinful. No doubt homosexuals sin, as we all do, but what arrogance to call particular attention to them.

If sins can be ranked, I expect arrogance would be at the top. Arrogance is assuming knowledge of what is not known or cannot be known. Arrogance is failing to notice the mote in one's own eye while crucifying another for the speck in his or her eye. Arrogance is calling homosexuality sinful.

Cats ready to face CUBy MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team is not an underdog for the first time in several weeks.

When the Cats (11-13, 4-7) travel to Boulder, Colo., at 7 tonight, they will face a Colorado team that has struggled nearly all season. K-State, however, is riding the emotional wave of an upset Sunday of then-No. 8 Iowa State.

As unbelievable as it might have sounded just one week ago, the Cats will have to force themselves not to look past the Buffaloes (7-15, 2-9) to their game Saturday against Kansas.

However, head coach Deb Patterson said her team is not watching the schedule.

KSU at home for track meetBy NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Improvement is the key for the K-State track and field program this week. The Cats have a rare mid-week meet when they play host to the KSU Open on Wednesday at Ahearn Field House.

K-State track and field coach Cliff Rovelto said the meet will have a variety of competitors.

"It is an open meet that runs the gamut of competition," Rovelto said. "It will have some Olympians and world champions, and a lot of people from the Midwest who train here."

He said in addition to the unattached athletes, it also will feature some smaller area schools.

"We will have some smaller schools, and there will be a different range of abilities," Rovelto said. "Some of the events will be very good. Things like the throws and the pole vault will be decent. Still, there will be some events that have outstanding mark."

It likely will be the last indoor

ASPIRATIONSWrestling club hopes to achieve NCAA statusBy JEFF CALDWELL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In wake of news that a new women's sport will be offered in the near future at K-State, Adam Hayes, wrestling club president, has lofty ambitions that wrestling someday can become a varsity sport at K-State.

"I think it will happen eventually, as long as the club stays alive," Hayes said.

Hayes, a sophomore in art, has roots in wrestling that began well before his experiences at K-State. He began competing in middle school at the kids' club level. After participating at that level for two years, he made the wrestling team at Wichita Northwest High School, where he competed all four years.

"I couldn't stand sitting around not wrestling," Hayes said. "Some of the best wrestlers in Kansas came to K-State, and they just ended their wrestling careers, but they came here for academics, so their main concern isn't wrestling."

Now, after one season behind him, Hayes and the team have a new coach.

"I'm really there for organization and to point out the little things," Harold Jagerson, wrestling club coach, said.

Jagerson is the new coach of the K-State club wrestling program, who also has a wide background in wrestling. For more than 30 years, Jagerson has participated in wrestling in some capacity. In college, he wrestled for Iowa State, but this is his first experience in coaching a collegiate-level program after having coached at other levels for 15 years. Jagerson still can recall his days on the mat.

"You never forget it," Jagerson said. "Being a former college wrestler myself, I know it is very exciting. Once a wrestler, always a wrestler."

The K-State squad consists of 14 members, though Hayes said that only four or five of them are regularly able to practice and compete.

"We're always trying to get new people to fill the roster," Hayes said.

The club competes against a wide range of opponents throughout the Midwest. The K-State squad competes in the southwest conference, which includes club teams from Texas A&M, Texas Tech, the University of Texas and the University of Kansas.

Because the majority of the National Collegiate Wrestling Association tournaments and meets take place in Texas, the distance makes it difficult for the team to compete regularly. Although the team isn't able to participate in NCWA meets often, it is able to wrestle at the NCAA level, in both Divisions I and II. In addition, it also competes occasionally in NAIA and NJCAA tournaments.

"At every level, we are competing against some pretty tough guys," Hayes said.

The possibility of K-State making wrestling a varsity sport is something Hayes would like to see happen soon, but he is skeptical about its immediate future.

I don't think there is a very good chance before I graduate," Hayes said.

Jagerson said the club is a work in progress.

"What we're hoping for as a club is to educate people on the excitement of college wrestling," he said. "It's a fairly young organization, but we just have to go after this thing."

Even though they might not see wrestling matches at Bramlage Coliseum within the next couple of years, both Hayes and Jagerson remain optimistic in regard to the future of varsity wrestling at K-State.

"I believe it will happen sooner or later, but I think the key is keeping the club alive so we have an active program," Hayes said.

Freshman Buchanan off to good start

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He's just a developing freshman, but his persona already is raising comparisons to longtime NBA great Scottie Pippen.

"They're really about the same size, with those long arms, lanky and athletic. Boy, I think that is a really good comparison," said Felix Grimmer, head basketball coach at Junction City High School.

His name is Quentin Buchanan, and he is a forward on the K-State men's basketball team.

Although Wildcat assistant coach Mark Fox sees potential on the horizon, he said comparisons to Pippen might be premature.

"I don't think it's fair to compare anybody to Scottie Pippen he's probably one of the 25 best players of all time," Fox said. "But he is long and athletic and the same height, so certainly there are some similarities in their athleticism."

"But that's a different level, and Quentin's just a young freshman, so we'll see what he's like as a senior, and then maybe we can make those comparisons."

Buchanan, a highly recruited athlete out of Junction City, was voted Mr. Basketball last year by the Kansas Basketball Coaches Association.

Grimmett said Buchanan was heavily pursued by such college programs as Oklahoma

State, and head coach Eddie Sutton, Texas A&M and Saint Louis.

However, the 6-foot-7-inch, 200-pound guard chose the Wildcats so he could stay close to home and play with former high school teammate and Wildcat sophomore Travis Reynolds.

"Those guys are really close," Grimmer said. "When they lived in Junction City, they lived next door — and I'm not exaggerating — they were next-door neighbors. I think that, without a doubt, Travis had some kind of positive influence on Quentin to go there."

At Junction City, Grimmer said Buchanan and Reynolds were something special, something not every coach has the privilege to experience. In high school, they combined to lead the Bluejays to an 18-5 record, an I-70

League Championship and a berth in the Class 6A State Tournament in 1998.

"On the floor, they just complemented each other so well. Both of those guys are really unselfish," Grimmer said. "They're from good families, they've been brought up right and they've got really good mannerisms."

"I think they have a lot of respect for each other. They put the team first before themselves. They're struggling with not being successful right now, but if they can just hang on, things are going to get better."

Fox said the Cats have landed quite a tandem.

Grimmett said it's special to see two of his products excelling at the next level.

"I've watched a lot of K-State games in the past, and when you've got players on that same floor paying the price — a part of you is out there," he said. "So I take a lot of pride in that. But at the same time, we just have to be there to support the kids and give them guidance when they need it."

While Reynolds was making his name at K-State as a freshman last year, Buchanan rounded out his high school career with an impressive senior season.

Buchanan averaged 19.7 points and 7.6 rebounds to lead the Bluejays to a 15-6 record and a second consecutive I-70 League championship in 1999.

He received numerous honors, including such accolades as Kansas Player of the Year by Kansas Sports magazine.

Now, in his first season in NCAA Division I basketball, Fox is impressed by Buchanan's play. His top performance this season came in the Cats' loss Jan. 22 at Colorado. In just his second career start, Buchanan scored a career-high 12 points on 4-of-6 shooting and grabbed seven rebounds in a career-high 30 minutes of action.

"It got my confidence level going pretty high, so every game now I know what I can do," Buchanan said.

"So I just try to go out and do what I did in the Colorado game."

Fox said Buchanan has been given many daunting tasks this season, including the challenge of being pitted against the opposing player's scoring threat.

"I like that," Buchanan said. "I try to take pride in my defense, it challenges me. That's what I like — to show everybody what I can do."

"It's a big transition. The intensity level is high, and every game you've got to go out and give 110 percent."

Fox said Buchanan has been rewarded for facing some of those challenges, because he has played fairly well.

"He has played a large role on our team," he said, "and we've probably asked him to do a little more than most freshmen would be expected to do, simply because of the injuries to Josh Reid and Travis Reynolds, who share the same position with Quentin."

"So, he's probably had more responsibility than the typical freshman would have, but that will pay great dividends for him in his career down the road. He'll be an outstanding Big 12 player, so I think he'll be exciting for a lot of K-State fans to watch."

Pressed for time, writer utilizes train of thought

They say that necessity is the mother of invention. That statement seems dubious to me right now. I have to study for four tests, and I have yet to receive any divine sports inspiration so I can get this week's column done and return to studying.

So, in the efforts of saving time, I once again will lean on my favorite worn, weathered and time-tested sportswriting crutch. It is the bane of journalism professors everywhere, but it might free up enough study time to get me an "A" on my MIS test. Without further ado, away we go with some loosely connected thoughts. ...

* Speaking of loosely connected, what was Vince McMahon thinking when he dreamed up this whole XFL idea? The man behind the contrived, soap operaesque dramas of the World Wrestling Federation (home to the world's worst actors not named "Keanu") is taking on more than he can handle in trying to outpromote the NFL.

In the past month, the NFL already has given us the "Music City Miracle" and a former Iowa grocery stocker as most valuable player of possibly the most dramatic Super Bowl ever, among others. Then there is the off-field drama: the NFL has produced two murder suspects, two men investigated in connection with a multistate drug ring, and one who essentially beat his ex-girlfriend up because of a pizza.

No matter what kind of success McMahon has had with wrestling, all the folding chairs in the world won't be able to equal the real-life mixture of exhilaration and disgust the NFL lately has been providing viewers. This brainchild looks like it will not get off the crowd.

Speaking of questionable ideas, how about the Los Angeles Lakers trading Glen Rice? Rice has had a reserved seat atop the rumor mill since criticizing head coach Phil

Jackson and complaining that he wasn't getting the ball enough during a recent slide.

Though Rice might have a bad attitude, however, he is too useful for the Lakers to trade, unless they get someone great (or at least better than Toni Kukoc) in return.

When on top of their games, Rice, Shaquille O'Neal and Kobe Bryant are very capable outside/inside/play making stars, and I think Los Angeles hurts its title chances by breaking up the tandem.

Jackson put up with Dennis Rodman in exchange for playoff success while with the Bulls. He should bite a similar bol-let this season and keep Rice around in the postseason.

Speaking of putting up with things, regardless of whether you like the man, you have to feel just a little bit sorry for K-State head coach Tom Asbury.

No one can be in coaching as long as Asbury without taking the job personally. It must be a shameful experience to suffer a 10-game losing streak while being followed at every turn by a chorus of people holding notebooks and asking whether you are frustrated. Having to confirm that yes, you are, in fact, disappointed that a week of 18-hour days is fuel enough to propel your team to a 30-point humiliation.

I think we all can agree that the Wildcat basketball team has not lived up to expectations for this season, to put it diplomatically. Asbury is miserable, the players are miserable and the fans are miserable. I won't presume to say whether it's entirely Asbury's fault — that is for the Athletic Department of Intercollegiate Athletics to judge, and moreover, your average Burmese tribesman knows basketball X's and O's better than I.

KC bids Thomas final farewell

BY DOUG TUCKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Derrick Thomas was remembered Tuesday as a great linebacker who taught children to read, lived life to the fullest and might save lives by the way he died.

"Why did this happen?" Kansas City Chiefs general manager Carl Peterson asked at a memorial service for the nine-time Pro-Bowler.

"Why did God let him live another 2 1/2 weeks? Perhaps it was to bring more attention to the importance of putting your seat belt on — for yourself and your children."

Several thousand people, including current and former players, NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue and baseball hall-of-famer George Brett gathered in Kemper Arena for the service, which lasted almost 3 1/2 hours.

Thomas, 33, died Feb. 8 of complications from a Jan. 23 accident that killed his best friend and left the pass-rushing specialist paralyzed from the chest down.

After being transferred to a hospital in Miami, Thomas was thought to be improving until a pulmonary embolism suddenly ended his life.

Neither he nor his friend was wearing a seat belt and both were thrown from their car.

A third passenger, who was wearing his seat belt, walked away with slight injuries.

"It's taken Derrick's death for me to buckle my seat belt," said Chiefs' head coach Gunther Cunningham. "But I'll wear it every time I get in my car."

Almost everyone wore No. 58 buttons in honor of Thomas, whose jersey No. 58 will be retired by the Chiefs. Many fans wore Chiefs jerseys and other Chiefs gear.

The coffin, closed at the front of the stage, was surrounded by a colorful floral display.

Two huge screens showed close-up shots of Thomas at various moments in his 11-year career. Another action shot showed him sacking Denver quarterback John Elway.

Thomas' open coffin had sat in Arrowhead Stadium's east end zone Monday, near the spot where he once sacked Elway and recovered a fumble for a touchdown that clinched a playoff berth.

"It will always be 58 degrees at Arrowhead," said former mayor Emanuel Cleaver Jr.

Not every moment was sad.

Speakers recounted Thomas' well-known penchant for showing up late, or sometimes not showing up at all.

"If you knew Derrick well, you had probably been stood up a few times," said Kevin Regan, Thomas' personal attorney. "If you knew Derrick really, really well, you had probably been stood up several times."

Cunningham recalled a conversation with Thomas shortly after he replaced Marty Schottenheimer as head coach following the 1998 season.

"You know, you're replacing a legend," Thomas told him. "Boy, are you lucky you've got me."

Agent Leigh Steinberg recalled how Thomas was known as the social director of the NFL.

"Derrick had more friends across the NFL than any other player I've ever seen," Steinberg said.

Many speakers talked about Thomas' Third and Long Foundation, which promotes literacy and reading among young people and has become one of the most popular projects in the Kansas City area. The loudest applause went to Rahman McGill, a junior high school student and one of Thomas' Third and Long graduates.

"I know we're all very focused and determined," Patterson said. "If we could go on the road and compete with Colorado or walk off of that floor with a victory, we will have taken huge steps from where we were two weeks ago."

To continue making steps, the Cats will have to overcome Colorado's size advantage. The Buffaloes depend on their height to get easy buckets in the paint on offense. In the post, Colorado is led by 6-foot, 4-inch sophomore center Britt Hartshorn and 6-2 freshman forward Sabrina Scott.

Patterson said Scott's play has been impressive.

"I think Sabrina Scott is one of the most talented freshmen in the country," Patterson said. "She has a great game. She can play inside and outside, and she's going to give whoever's guarding her trouble."

Despite this size advantage, the Cats are confident they will be able to stop Colorado with consistent defense, point guard April Sailors said.

"I don't think size is a big issue," Sailors said. "We'll be able to stop them as long as we play aggressive."

In addition to taking advantage of its height to score, Colorado also uses its natural mismatches when applying pressure on the defensive end. Fortunately for the Cats, K-State guards have shown an ability in recent games to handle the press.

Against Iowa State, Sailors actually was able to turn the Cyclones' full-court press into a two-on-one break for the Cats, a skill Patterson said Sailors has developed.

"I felt like she made some great decisions and played with great poise against pressure that two weeks ago would have forced her into a turnover," Patterson said.

When the Cats do break the pressure, they have had success shooting from the perimeter. Against Iowa State, K-State hit a season-high 12 three-pointers, and Colorado has allowed six three-pointers a game.

Despite this possible advantage, the Cats still will rely, as they have all year, on their post players, Patterson said.

"I think the key to the game will be our post play," Patterson said. "Our post players are going to have to step up and force Colorado to beat us from the perimeter."

Rovelto said he is looking for strong performances from his team as the indoor season enters its home stretch.

"Basically, it will be the last meet before the Big 12 Championships and the USA Indoor Championships," Rovelto said.

Regardless of who gets what blame and why, Asbury should be cut free at the end of the season.

His hold on his current players is tenuous, and trying to outrecruit KU for new ones is a losing cause at this point.

There is little left that he can do here. Asbury and the Wildcats both need fresh starts, and, more importantly, the chance to repair their tarnished basketball reputations while they still can.

Speaking of column topics, Tiger Woods was denied a seventh straight Professional Golfers Association Tour victory this past weekend. Though he might not have equaled Byron Nelson's record (yet), his streak was still quite impressive.

How impressive? Think back to that heart-stopping, nail-biting, game-winning 73-yard touchdown pass Kurt Warner threw to win the Super Bowl.

Now imagine having to do that six games in a row. I'm not usually appreciative of golf, but my hat is off to Woods for a great run.

Rodeo Queen pageant scheduled

By COURTNEY DUFFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Modeling, interviewing skills and horsemanship are three talents K-State Rodeo Queen candidates must possess.

The 2000 Rodeo Queen pageant is being organized by Melanie Hutting, 1999 K-State Rodeo Queen and sophomore in animal sciences and industry. The pageant will begin Saturday.

"The outgoing queen puts on the pageant for the incoming contestants," Hutting said.

The contestants are required to give a 3 1/2 to five minute speech during the competition.

"I gave the topic to the girls on Friday and it is different every year," Hutting said.

Hutting said this year, the topic deals with the controversies that have arisen between rodeos and animal rights activists. She said the contestants have to speak to the judges, just as they would to an activist group, and try to convince them that rodeos are beneficial.

The interview portion of the pageant will confront contestants with questions about national rodeo events, K-State and other news events.

Hutting said it is important to be knowledgeable about all three categories because the queen will be representing the K-State Rodeo Club and K-State when she travels to different rodeos throughout the year.

The horsemanship portion of the pageant will test the contestants on a reigning pattern, a horsemanship pattern and a queen's run, Hutting said.

She said a modeling portion of the pageant requires the contestants to wear western attire. Their dresses must be long.

Points will be tallied at the end of the pageant, and whoever has earned the most will be the 2000 Rodeo Queen.

"Each division is worth a certain amount of points," Hutting said.

"There are going to be four judges." There are four contestants competing this year: Shannon Burkdoll, junior in agricultural journalism; Valerie Wurtz, freshman in animal sciences and industry and pre-veterinary medicine; Amy Castleberry, junior in pre-professional business administration and Dawn Smith, freshman in animal sciences and industry.

"I decided to compete because I thought it would be a neat experience and it would broaden my horizons," Wurtz said.

Wurtz said she has been riding horses since she was 4 years old. She said her riding experience helps because she is not starting from scratch and thus having to learn how to ride.

Hutting said the experience of being queen for the past year was a good one.

"I really met a lot of people I think I will stay in touch with," Hutting said. "The competition was a lot of fun."

Char Henton, of Kansas Agricultural Median Services and K-State Research and Extension, has been involved with the pageants for many years. She answers any questions the women might have, and helps the queen throughout the year.

"Eight to nine years ago one of the queens asked me to take some pictures," Henton said. "Every year the girls know who I am."

The 2000 K-State Rodeo Queen will be crowned Feb. 26 at an evening rodeo performance.

"It is a great way to represent K-State," Henton said.

Research, hard work help debate team advance to octa-finals at recent tournament in Illinois

By GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Debate is a strategic game of pushing people into corners, Kevin Zollman, junior in philosophy, said.

The K-State debate team reached the octa-finals at the Northwestern University debate tournament Feb. 5 and 6 in Evanston, Ill.

"We are pleased with their performance since it was one of the largest tournaments in the spring semester," Susan Stanfield, debate coach, said.

The team of Zollman and Katie Hatzivramidis, senior in humanities, was defeated by their opponent from Emory University of Atlanta before the finals.

"It was a close debate," Zollman said. "It was decided by three judges, two of them for the opponent and one for us. It also took them a long time to decide, so that is a good indication that it was close."

Zollman said the main reason they lost was due to the rules of debate.

"Why we lost is really specific, more or less it was a technical issue," Zollman said. "In debate, there are limitations on the topic and a time limit, but besides that, all other rules are argued out during the debate."

"The debates aren't always the same, even though it is the same topic."

— Kevin Zollman, junior in philosophy

The topic for all competitors for the entire year is whether the United States should lift economic sanctions on Cuba, North Korea, Syria, Iran or Iraq, Hatzivramidis said.

"It is interesting in comparison with former topics because it is really small," Zollman said.

"Although narrow, it moves quickly since it is so current.

You really have to stay on top of research."

The issue requires the debaters to constantly watch for changes in the situation of the countries, especially since economic sanctions have been changing lately.

"The debates aren't always the same, even though it is the same topic," Zollman said. "There are a hundred possible arguments, and you don't know what each team is going to argue, and they don't know what you are going to argue."

Every team has to have the knowledge to defend or attack any angle of any of the five countries.

Hatzivramidis said they depend on information from a variety of sources to keep them current, such as books or magazines.

"We have been to the library many times looking for information on the countries," Hatzivramidis said.

"Sometimes you just have to find the individual paragraphs with relevant facts."

Do they all lead to the same place?

Some people say the world's religions represent many roads, all leading to the same God. Can this be true? Religious traditions such as Islam and Buddhism differ significantly from one another, and we should take these differences seriously, appreciating the uniqueness of each view. Embracing one religion means excluding the others -- so how do we make an informed decision?

MAGIC With mallets

Renowned marimbist to perform tonight at McCain Auditorium

STORY AND PHOTOS BY REED DUNN

He has 400, but he only can handle six at a time.

Makoto Nakura, marimbist, has been playing the marimba since he was 8. The marimba is a percussion instrument similar to a piano, except the keys are struck with a mallet.

Nakura, who will perform tonight at First Presbyterian Church, said there are a number of different shapes and sizes of mallets, each made with a variety of yarns. Even though two and four-mallet compositions are most common, Nakura said he is able to use up to six mallets at a time.

"There are several pieces written for six mallets," he said. "I sometimes ask composers to write music I can play with six mallets."

Richard P. Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said Nakura is one of the musicians from the Young Concert Artist series. He said the winners of the YCA are some of the best artists from around the world.

"They are first-rate performers who are very good at performing to young people," Martin said. "He's got a personality. Nakura's not just someone who can play the marimba—he is knowledgeable as well."

Six mini-concerts for grade schools in the Manhattan area were part of Nakura's visit to K-State. Thom Jackson, marketing officer of McCain, said the school visits teach students practice and discipline, in addition to educating them on the instruments.

"What's really neat is some of these students have never been in front of an artist like this," Jackson said.

"Nakura said he likes to visit schools to educate students and share his appreciation for music."

"I think it's really important to give exposure to the kids," he said. "I want kids to become music lovers."

Nakura also worked with a percussion studio class at K-State. Grant Whitcomb, sophomore in music education, said the class focused on musical issues, techniques and body movements.

"It was great. This kind of experience doesn't come along every day," Whitcomb said. "It's great to have an artist of this caliber come in and teach us."

After winning the YCA international competition in 1994, Nakura said he started getting booked for more shows in the United States. The Japan native said he commuted from Tokyo for three years until the schedule got so busy he needed to move to New York City.

Fifth through eighth grade students watch as Makoto Nakura performs on the marimba at Seven Dolors Grade School gym Tuesday afternoon.

Performing on "CBS Sunday Morning" is just one of Nakura's many credits. He also has performed at the Royal Academy of Music in London, the Kennedy Center and the Lincoln Center.

Nakura is scheduled to play at Carnegie Hall on Feb. 28. He said playing in Carnegie Hall is nothing that makes him nervous.

"It's basically the same thing — playing in front of people," he said.

"It's just the music I play that's a little different."

Tonight's performance will feature a variety of music, ranging from Japanese pieces, a few original songs written for Nakura and some works by Johann Sebastian Bach.

Jackson said the performance will be original, but will provide some music from well-known artists.

"It will be a very interesting and exciting performance," Jackson said. "The audience will hear things they've never heard before."

Nakura said he is looking forward to playing some of his original works for a local audience. "The most exciting thing about my concert is I will be playing my own music and it will be my own thing," Nakura said.

Whitcomb said he thinks seeing the instrument played live is an opportunity students should not pass up, because marimba solo concerts are not common in this area.

"I think it's outstanding," Whitcomb said. "Not very many people have exposure to music from the marimba, and this will give them a chance to see it live."

ticket info

Makoto Nakura will perform at 7:30 tonight at First Presbyterian Church, 801 Leavenworth St. Tickets for the show are $12 for the public, $10 for seniors and $6 for students and children. Tickets are available at the McCain Box Office or at the door.

UPC to sponsor free screening of 'Boiler Room'

By KRISTEN DYMAK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Millions of dollars. That's the driving force of the American dream in the new movie "Boiler Room."

Free. That's the price of admission to an advance screening tonight of "Boiler Room."

The screening, sponsored by the Union Program Council, begins at 8 tonight in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union. It's available to anyone who has picked up a free pass from the UPC office.

Michael Rottinghaus, UPC Feature Films Committee chairman, said that even though the doors open at 7:30, students should arrive earlier.

"All the passes have been handed out already," Rottinghaus said.

"There will probably be a long line, so people should start arriving at 6 or earlier."

Paul Donovan, UPC program adviser, said the screenings are popular because it's a chance for students to be some of the first to see a new movie.

"We've done advance screenings like this over the past couple of years," Donovan said.

"The word has gotten out. Students are coming because it's a regular first-run film that can be seen for free before everyone in America gets a chance to see it."

"Boiler Room," which opens Friday around the country, stars Giovanni Ribisi as Seth Davis, a young college dropout who has two goals in life: He wants to earn $1 million and his father's respect.

After a failed attempt at running an illicit casino out of his apartment, Davis joins the boiler room, a stockbrokerage firm run by young men caught up in the excitement of earning millions of dollars.

Davis soon gets caught up with the rest of the stockbrokers in the greed of selling bogus stock to unsuspecting investors.

When he begins to investigate the ethics and the legality of the boiler room, he ends up on the verge of losing his friends, his money, his job and, most importantly, his father.

"Boiler Room," written and directed by newcomer Ben Younger, also stars

Ben Affleck, Vin Diesel, Tom Everett Scott and Nia Long.

Donovan said "Boiler Room" will be broadcast by satellite to more than 40 schools by Network Event Theater.

To get an idea of what people think of the movie, each school will poll a sample of students and have them answer questions about the film.

"There's a small poll of students at the end of the film," Donovan said.

"There's a random drawing of about 10 students who fill out two or three questions about the movie. They also get a small incentive for participating."

Billie Meili, senior in accounting and UPC vice president for administrative affairs, said she has been to other advance screenings and that she is looking forward to seeing "Boiler Room."

"Boiler Room"

Call the UPC office at 532-6571 for information about upcoming advance screenings. For more information about "Boiler Room," visit www.boilermovie.com.

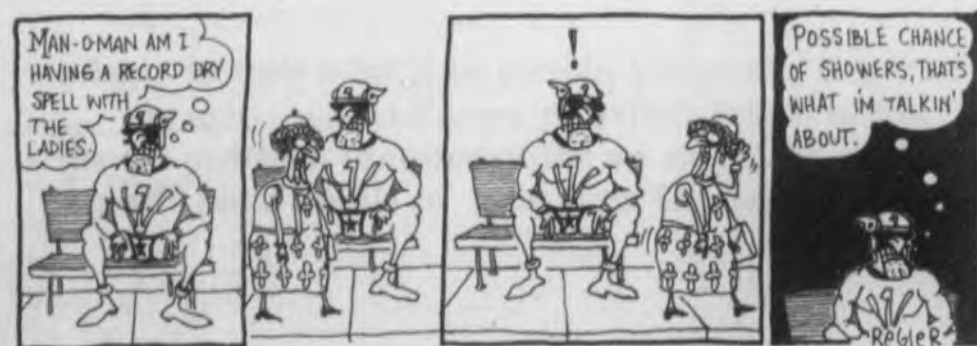

"I've seen the previews on TV," she said. "I think it'll be pretty good."

Tim Yeaglin, senior in business management and UPC president, said he likes the fact that he's able to see a free movie premiere.

"It's a chance to preview it first," Yeaglin said.

"I'd probably go see it in the theater, but why pay for it when I can see it for free?"

'American Beauty' leads Oscar nominees

By DAVID GERMAIN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — The Oscars embraced dysfunction and darkness Tuesday, bestowing a leading eight nominations on the suburban burlesque "American Beauty" and honoring movies about abortion, death row and the tormented souls of the dead.

The top nominees included "The Cider House Rules," set in a combination orphanage and abortion mill; "The Sixth Sense," about a boy from a broken home who can see ghosts; and "The Green Mile," about the bonds between prison guards and condemned men.

Those four movies, along with "The Insider," a film about a tobacco industry whistle-blower, were nominated for best picture.

The top acting categories also were heavy on family dysfunction.

The best-actor candidates included Kevin Spacey in "American Beauty" as a dad who blackmails his boss, smokes pot with a neighbor kid and flirts with his daughter's cheer-leading friend.

The other nominees were Sean Penn as a womanizing jazz guitarist in Woody Allen's "Sweet and Lowdown"; Denzel Washington in "The Hurricane" as boxer Rubin Carter, unfairly convicted of murder; Russell Crowe as the whistle-blower in "The Insider"; and Richard Farnsworth as an irascible old man who takes a road trip on his lawn mower in "The Straight Story."

Snubbed for the second straight year was Jim Carrey, who did an uncanny take on the late comic Andy Kaufman in "Man on the Moon." Carrey received back-to-back Golden Globes for that movie and "The Truman Show" in 1998 but failed to get an Oscar nomination for either role.

the nominees

The best-actress nominees included two adulterous wives (Annette Bening in "American Beauty" and Julianne Moore in "The End of the Affair"), two struggling single moms (Meryl Streep in "Music of the Heart" and Janet McTeer in "Tumbleweeds") and a woman with a sexual identity crisis who poses as a man (Hilary Swank in "Boys Don't Cry").

It was Streep's 12th acting nomination, tying the record held by Katharine Hepburn.

"Cider House" and "Insider" had seven nominations each, and "Sixth Sense" had six.

The awards will be presented March 26 on ABC.

The Oscars have taken some dark departures in the past with such best-picture winners as "Midnight Cowboy," "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest" and "Ordinary People." During the past 15 years or so, though, the awards have tended to favor epics or costume pieces such as "Amadeus," "Dances With Wolves," "Titanic" and "Shakespeare in Love."

Another superstar, Tom Cruise, got a supporting-actor nomination for his role as a misogynistic sex guru in "Magnolia."

"The Hurricane" got only one nomination, for Washington. It had been viewed as a leading contender for a best-picture nomination.

Tiananmen Square blast kills bomber, injures Korean tourist

By JOHN LEICESTER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEIJING — A man set off explosives in Tiananmen Square on Tuesday, killing himself and injuring a South Korean tourist in what Chinese police quickly labeled a suicide.

The blast — in the symbolic center of China's political life — occurred at a politically touchy time. Police are on alert to prevent members of the Falun Gong sect from continuing the protests they sporadically have organized on the square in defiance of the communist government's nearly seven-month ban on the group.

In less than three weeks, the national legislature opens its annual session in the Great Hall of the People, an event which typically attracts disaffected Chinese to protest at adjacent Tiananmen. Beijing's municipal legislature began its yearly meeting Tuesday, six miles from the square.

Police were quick to say that Tuesday's bomber was not a member of Falun Gong, but a mentally ill man from central Hubei province. A police official said Li Xiangshan was known to police, having come to the capital four times previously to appeal to Chinese leaders.

Xinhua, the government news agency, described Li as a farmer and said the South Korean tourist was slightly injured.

Neither police nor Xinhua described the type of explosives used nor elaborated on the motives.

The fact that the explosion occurred in a prominent location and affected a foreigner likely prompted police and the state-controlled media to break their usual silence on such matters.

The explosion took place around 4 p.m., when the square normally is crowded with tourists, and was heard by nearby shopkeepers. Police immediately ordered people away from the square and closed the plaza.

Police then walked in a line across the square from east to west, apparently scanning the ground for evidence or debris. Plastic green sheeting was erected around a lamppost in the square's center — the site of the explosion.

Fifty feet away, a dented trash bin lay on its side.

A police officer searched a nearby patch of grass with a metal detector, and a crane was brought in either to repair or pull evidence from the lamppost.

While terrorist incidents occasionally occur in China's Muslim northwest — where members of the Uighur ethnic group are fighting Chinese rule — bombings of any sort in the capital are rare.

Nearly three years ago, two bombs exploded near a shopping center and on a public bus going down one of Beijing's busiest streets. At least eight people were injured.

Although disgruntled unemployed workers originally were suspected, security forces now say they believe the bombs were set by Muslim separatists from Xinjiang.

In May 1997, police said a migrant worker used a homemade bomb to commit suicide in Zhongshan Park, just off Tiananmen Square and near the offices of China's top leaders.

Search ends for man suspected of shooting police officers, farmer

By JESSICA FARGEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LUSK, Wyo. — The search for a Texas survivalist wanted in the killing of a farmer and the wounding of two law officers in Nebraska ended late Tuesday when the fugitive was wrestled to the ground after entering a couple's home.

Charles Lannis Moses Jr., accused of shooting two Nebraska police officers on Saturday and gunning down a farmer on Monday, had outrun authorities in the hills just over the Nebraska-Wyoming state line.

He was caught around 8:40 p.m. after entering a farmhouse, where a couple wrestled a firearm away from him and called police, Sgt. Troy McLees of the Wyoming State Patrol said.

Moses, a 31-year-old construction worker, was not injured in the confrontation but he was taken to a hospital for injuries he suffered in a shootout with Nebraska officers on Saturday night, McLees said.

"He wasn't going to last very long — he had to get out of there," McLees said. "It's pretty cold and windy down there."

A first-degree murder warrant was issued for Moses on Tuesday, a day after a western Nebraska farmer was shot to death. Authorities, already searching for Moses after the shootout Saturday, found Moses in Wyoming on Tuesday afternoon, but he managed to escape in the remote, hilly area.

The search had shifted to eastern Wyoming from western Nebraska. In the Paxton, Neb., area, military helicopters were called in Tuesday and schools closed as more than 100 state troopers searched for Moses. Paxton is about 150 miles southeast of Lusk.

Nebraska Gov. Mike Johanns declared a state of emergency, which allowed the guard to use two unarmed Blackhawk helicopters in the search.

Farmer Robert Sedlacek, 48, was found shot to death near an abandoned farmhouse eight miles from Paxton. Police believe Moses had been hiding out on the farm and killed Sedlacek to steal his pickup truck.

Sedlacek was speaking with his father-in-law, Paul Fisher, on a cellular phone and said he noticed unusual tire tracks on the property, Keith County Attorney Deborah Gilg said.

Fisher said his last words with Sedlacek were to warn his son-in-law about the fugitive. "I heard him say, 'What are you doing here?' and the phone went dead," Fisher said.

The manhunt started late Saturday when a sheriff's deputy tried to arrest Moses on Texas charges of theft and evading arrest.

HORSES

could scare it outside the pen.

"In each place you take a horse, it is completely new and different to them," Kautz said. "You need to get a good ground work and start before you move on to the next step. A missed step could make a scary environment seem terrifying for a horse."

Raub said the advanced training class is an extension from the beginning training class in the fall. In the spring, eight to 12 students are enrolled.

He said the horses come from K-State's own breeding program, donations or individuals who want to put their horses through the training program. After the training is completed, the individual decides whether to take the horse back or sell it with the rest at the sale in March.

"This gives students the opportunity to experience working with horses and take with them what they have learned for their own personal knowledge," Raub said. "This ultimately is put to good use in other things because success is the ultimate endeavor in anything."

Leah Kroencke, senior in pre-veterinary medicine and animal science, said although she has not become attached to the horse she is working, Silver, she became so attached to the horse she worked with last semester that she bought it.

"It is so easy to become attached to a horse you have been working with for an entire semester," Kroencke said. "Fancy and I fit so well together that I decided to buy her. She is such a good-looking horse, and we have the same general personality."

Kautz said becoming attached to an animal you have spent time and energy training is relatively easy because the trainer becomes proud of what the animal has learned and eager to see it move to the next phase of training.

"It's different for everyone, but when you see a horse you work with accomplish something, you feel proud," Kautz said. "You know that someone will then take the horse even further and that's a good feeling, but there is no way you will ever know the outcome of what you started."

Kroencke said she likes the class because it gives her and the other students an opportunity to work with horse and train them in preparation of the next phase of their lives.

"It is the class to take for people who like to be outside and work with horses," Kroencke said. "When you are up on a horse, nothing matters. You are relaxed and have a free feeling inside of you."

COMMISSION

to give First National at least six months to present plans for redevelopment, financing, acquisition and parking for the area. The city then could terminate the agreement after that point and keep the $10,000 First National paid as part of the agreement.

On the other hand, the agreement spells out four-year exclusive rights to the area if the city agrees to continue.

Mayor Roger Reitz said the plan also has the advantage that the city must approve the developer's plans to relocate residents, unlike independent developers.

Little in the way of detail has been revealed on the shopping center plan or its tenants, but Demetrios Dellaportas, First National consultant, said the firm would work closely with the city on its plans.

"If it's not satisfying to you, it doesn't happen," he said. "The development of your downtown, in my opinion, is a must for your town."

In other business, the commission authorized giving $93,000 to K-State and $50,000 to the Manhattan Public Library as part of the 2000 City/University Tax Fund.

Commissioners, with the exception of Snead, also rejected a proposal to change the baseball infields at Twin Oaks Sports Complex from sandy loam infields to agriculture lime. A revised motion passed by the commission recommended only changing two of the fields as a test for the harder, sharper covering.

The commission also voted unanimously to transfer the T. Russell Reitz Regional Animal Shelter from the Riley County-Manhattan Board of Health to the exclusive control of the city.

Students' participation with local census benefits university

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students could be a crucial part of the upcoming census for Manhattan.

Scott Jones, assistant dean of student life, said claiming residency in Manhattan can be important to the university.

Unlike the federal census, students can claim residency in their hometowns for the state census if they wish. However, by claiming residency in Manhattan, students can benefit the university and the city, he said.

"The issue of higher education comes up often in the Legislature," he said. "The greater number of representatives we have the greater the voice proportionately we have, in the Legislature."

The census is a population count used to apportion seats in the U.S. House of Representatives. The state census determines legislative boundary lines in Kansas.

However, Sherman Parks Jr., district census manager, said he didn't think Kansas as a whole would lose or gain any congressional seats because of the federal census.

Jones said banners and posters soon will be going up around campus to inform students of the census' importance, and students will be able to fill out the state census form on KATS as soon as later this month.

"It is very important that all persons take part in both census initiatives because they are a matter of financial importance to Manhattan, Riley County and most certainly the university," Jones said.

Ockert Fourie, city senior planner, said the census is important to the city of Manhattan for financial reasons as well.

He said the city is close to reaching the 50,000 population mark.

If the city reaches 50,000, it will become what is called an entitlement city. It automatically would qualify for some federal funds without fighting other small cities for funds available.

Programs such as public housing, education, public health, and welfare and transportation all receive federal funds.

The last census put the city's population at 41,000. However, some think the city was undercounted.

"It is really important for them to fill out the census if they are living in Manhattan, because it will allow the city to secure more federal funding for programs," Fourie said.

Federal census cards will go out around March 13 and are supposed to be back by late April.

Some people will get short forms, and one in six people will get a long form. The short forms, which take about 10 minutes to fill out, ask for basic information like name, age and sex.

The long forms, which take about 30-40 minutes to complete, ask more detailed questions like how many toilets you have in your house. Such information is used in creating watershed districts.

Students who live in Manhattan during the school year are supposed to be counted as living in Manhattan. Even international students are supposed to be counted in the federal census.

"The census is a snapshot of America at a certain point in time,"

Parks said.

If you don't fill out the card and send it in, you might get a knock on your door from a census taker. About 400 census takers will hit the streets of our 26-county region in the later part of May.

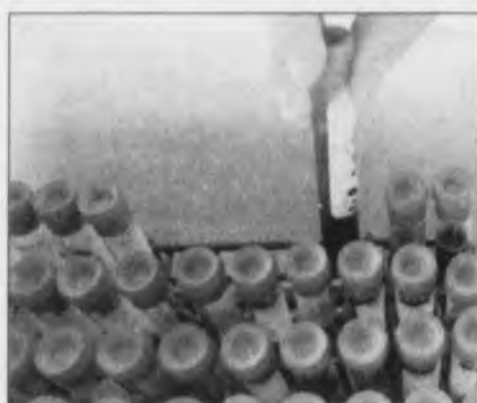

If you fill out that form, you also will be saving some tax dollars, Parks said.

The cost of gathering data for people who send in the form is about $2 per person. The cost increases to $38 if a census taker has to be sent out.

"The bottom line is that if you fill in the form, that is the last contact you will have with the U.S. census," Parks said.

CATTLE CLONING

The Department of Animal Science and Industry provides the cells to Cyagra, a commercial cloning company that does the surrogate-mother work. The company experiments with the cells in the petri dish by varying the length of time the cells are in the culture.

The process of cloning begins with a skin sample of the animal. After four to six weeks are spent developing the sample into an embryo, it is planted in a surrogate mother. If the process is successful, a genetically identical calf is born nine months later.

K-State assists cattle-cloning company in research

Kansas farmers soon will be able to clone their best-performing cattle, using knowledge generated by a handful of scientists and help from K-State.

Audi Spell is a research scientist for Cyagra of Kansas, a commercial cloning company that emerged from the University of Massachusetts and came to Manhattan in April 1999.

"Kansas is the heart of beef country," Spell said. "This is where we found the most opportunities."

Just shy of being one-year old, Cyagra is doing research to work through any problems and is not doing business yet. With any luck, it will have a successfully cloned calf in about eight months, but the success rate is only 20 percent.

Once the process has been improved, Spell said there will be enormous benefits for agriculture. Ranchers will be able to multiply superior genetics and replace inefficient animals. The producers will be able to replicate desirable traits and have a more uniform herd.

"This could revolutionize the dairy and beef industry," Spell said. "There's a lot of interest of what's possible."

The process begins with a skin sample. After four to six weeks are spent developing the sample into an embryo, it is planted in a surrogate mother. If the process is successful, a genetically identical calf is born nine months later.

However, it might not be entirely identical. Environmental effects can change how the calf behaves or performs. The amount of milk the surrogate mother provides also has huge effects, Spell said.

"The color pattern can even be slightly different," he said. "It could have a spot on its head in the same place, but it might vary in size."

K-State contributes to the research-intensive and time-consuming process, he said. K-State offers technology and knowledge to increase the pregnancy rates.

David Grieger, associate professor of animal science and industry, teaches a bovine-reproduction technology class. In his class, he gives one short lecture during the semester of the potential of cloning. Only in the past five years was it known that this was possible, he said.

"The science behind using adult cells and putting those in an unfertilized embryo is fascinating," Grieger said. "We're finding out things we wouldn't have ever known before."

The success of cloning depends on the market, Grieger said. It depends on how economical it is and whether small producers will be able to afford it.

"Our focus right now is to get over the hurdles," Grieger said. "Currently, it is a very inefficient process."

The Department of Animal Science and Industry provides the cells to Cyagra and does the surrogate-

Frozen tissue samples aid in animal cloning

People who miss their childhood hamsters now have an opportunity to see a genetically identical version of them again. That is, if they froze skin samples of the hamsters in liquid nitrogen before they died.

"Samples can be stored indefinitely in liquid nitrogen," said Audi Spell, research scientist for Cyagra of Kansas. "There are bull semen samples 20 years old in liquid nitrogen."

Spell said if the proper steps are taken, theoretically, an animal could be cloned infinitely.

Recently dead animals could be cloned if tissue samples were taken 24 to 48 hours after death and if the conditions, such as temperature, were right.

The 10,000-year-old mammoth recently found in Siberia even could be cloned if scientists find viable tissue samples that have been preserved, Spell said. Since the animal has been extinct long since, scientists probably would use the egg from an elephant to help in the cloning process.

There is an incredible market for cloning other animals, Spell said. Cloning animals with desirable traits, such as seeing-eye dogs for their trainability, has enormous potential, he said.

The knowledge and technology has not yet reached that level of efficiency. Some companies charge from $10,000 to $20,000 for one cloned calf, Spell said.

Cyagra will reach the level of efficiency to commercially clone cattle in about one year, Spell said. In the next couple of years, the company might be able to clone pigs, which have a different embryo physiology that must be researched.

Spell said he realizes the public response to cloning could be sensitive and unpredictable. The public needs to be educated of the potential of cloning, he said. For Spell, commercial animal cloning is as far as he's willing to go. Human cloning should not be territory to be discovered.

"I don't believe it should become a reality," he said. "I do not look forward to that happening."

Liquor offenses decline due to inconsistency

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Liquor violations on campus took a nose-dive in 1999 compared to 1998, and K-State law enforcement attributed inconsistent enforcement.

"We had a couple of officers that were in competition," Lt. Richard Herrman, K-State patrol commander, said. "They concentrated more on those than other violations."

Campus police reported 47 liquor violations in 1998 and only 11 in 1999. Those figures do not include DUIs or warning tickets.

The two officers in question have been replaced, and Herrman said the department was looking to have a more balanced patrol.

"Usually what happens if you concentrate heavily on one thing, you fall on the other side," Herrman said.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said he saw inconsistency between 1998 and 1999 crime figures.

"I don't think this an accurate reflection of what students are doing or not doing," he said. He said he hoped for improvement this year.

"We all want to be consistent in doing our jobs, and we are all trying to do that," Bosco said.

There were eight drug offenses reported in 1998, and 16 in 1999.

Burglaries on campus were up compared to 1998 with 155 burglaries in 1999, and only 135 in 1998.

Herrman attributed the increase to more students reporting crimes.

One nonforcible sex offense was reported in 1999, compared to one nonforcible and one forcible sex offense reported in 1998.

There were five aggravated assaults reported in 1999 compared to none in 1998, and three robberies reported in 1998 compared with none in 1999.

A total of 192 crimes were reported in the campus 1999 crime report compared to 200 crimes in 1998.

K-State exceeds scholarship goal of $50 million

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Scholarship Campaign has gone above its estimated goal of $50 million, with four months remaining to raise funds.

Gary Hellebust, president and CEO of the KSU Foundation, said more than $52 million has been raised from a number of sources, including private donations, cash gifts and pledges.

A cash gift is when a donor writes a check and gives it to the foundation. A deferred gift is when a donation is given at a later date, such as being left in an individual's will, and a private donation is when a donation is received from a private individual.

"The original feasibility study showed the foundation raising $30 million," Hellebust said. "We then set the goal at $50 million and are very pleased with the results so far."

Hellebust said the campaign began 18 months ago and will be completed at the end of June, when the next campaign begins.

He said the money raised is split between the nine colleges at K-State. Almost all of the colleges are within reach of their individual goals, with the colleges of Technology and Aviation and Veterinary Medicine already

Cyagra's Cloning Procedure

Cloning is a three-step process. Skin samples are scraped from the ear of the animal and taken to the laboratory. Within four to six weeks, embryos are developed from the skin cells in cell cultures. After the embryos have formed, they are placed in the surrogate mothers to mature.

Nickelodeon incorporates diversity into programming

NEW YORK — Nickelodeon is striking a blow for diversity with three new series with Hispanic leads, the children's cable network announced Wednesday.

Among its eight new series for the 2000-2001 season, Nickelodeon will launch "Taina," a multi-generational series about a 14-year-old Hispanic girl in New York City and another live-action show, "The Brothers Garcia," which revolves around a Mexican-American family in San Antonio, Texas. Told from the perspective of the youngest of four siblings, "Garcia" is described as a Hispanic "The Wonder Years."

In addition, an interactive animated series called "Dora the Explorer" will feature a 7-year-old Hispanic girl who lives inside a computer. In every episode, she invites young viewers to participate in an adventure.

Nickelodeon executive vice president Cyma Zarghami called the Hispanic-oriented new shows "a rounding out of our efforts to reflect the world of kids." Nickelodeon is the top-rated basic cable channel in households and among children.

Although no premiere dates were announced, the new series are expected to roll out between this summer and early next year.

Clinton pushes gun safety in response to shootings

WASHINGTON, D.C. — As a second suspect in the shooting deaths of two popular high school students surrendered to police Wednesday, President Clinton cited the slayings in his push to get Congress to approve gun safety legislation.

"Guns in the wrong hands continue to claim too many young lives, like those of Andre Wallace and Natasha Marsh," Clinton said at a White House news conference, adding that he hoped Congress would approve common-sense gun safety legislation.

Marsh and Wallace, both 17, died in a hail of bullets outside Marsh's home just hours after Wallace was involved in a fight in the Woodrow Wilson High School gymnasium.

Jermaine Johnson, an Amtrak train mechanic, turned himself in to District of Columbia Police early Wednesday. Johnson is the only person insured to drive the black 1997 Ford Expedition that police said was involved in the drive-by shooting. A second man, Carlton Blount, surrendered to police Tuesday.

Both men, who have refused to discuss the case with investigators, were charged with two counts each of first-degree murder. They were being arraigned Wednesday in Washington, D.C., Superior Court.

Police say they have received a videotape of the altercation between Blount and Wallace. "It puts Mr. Blount right there," William P. McManus, the assistant police chief, said.

Although Johnson is not seen in the video, police said he has a connection to Blount.

Wallace was captain of his high school football team, and Marsh was an honors student enrolled in a business and finance academy program at the school.

Their deaths are among 49 murders in the city this year. That represents a 35-percent increase from a year ago.

Study shows online usage reduces social interaction

SAN FRANCISCO — Too much time online makes people more likely to go offline in real life, according to a study released Wednesday.

"The more hours people use the Internet, the less time they spend with real human beings," said Norman Nie, a Stanford political scientist who conducted the study of the Net's impact on society with Professor Lutz Erbring of the Free University of Berlin.

The study found that too much time on the Internet makes people reclusive and less likely to interact with people face to face.

"The Internet could be the ultimate isolating technology that further reduces our participation in communities even more than television did before it," Nie said.

The study surveyed 4,113 American adults in 2,689 households and provided those respondents with free Internet access and WebTV to facilitate the survey. About one-third said they were online five or more hours per week. Of those people, 13 percent said they spent less time with family and friends, 26 percent talked less to family and friends on the phone and 8 percent attended fewer social events.

Do they all lead to the same place?

Some people say the world's religions represent many roads, all leading to the same God. Can this be true? Religious traditions such as Islam and Buddhism differ significantly from one another, and we should take these differences seriously, appreciating the uniqueness of each view. Embracing one religion means excluding the others -- so how do we make an informed decision?

Carmike fails to bring the Academy's best

"The Cider House Rules" is up for best picture.

"Sweet and Lowdown" is up for best actor and best supporting actress.

"Being John Malkovich" is up for best director and best supporting actress.

What do these movies have in common, besides being Oscar nominees this year?

None of them ever reached Manhattan theaters.

Carmike Cinemas, which owns both of Manhattan's movie theaters — Seth Childs Cinema and Westloop

Theatre — has taken a lot of heat for its recent ticket price hike. At Seth Childs, movies now cost $6.50 a pop, up from $5.50 just a few months ago.

Even more egregious is the abolishment of the student discount at that theater, which allowed K-State students — in addition to military personnel — to view a movie for less than $5. Carmike Cinemas officials indicated that Westloop's transformation to a second-run theater was replacing the discount.

But this all has been discussed in painstaking detail. What has not been mentioned is Carmike's inability to supply Manhattan residents with the films that the rest of America is raving about.

While movies like "The Cider House Rules," "The Straight Story," "Boys Don't Cry" and "Tumbleweeds" receive Oscar nominations, movies that do make it Manhattan — including such classics as "Jack Frost," "Pokémon: The First Movie," "Double Jeopardy," "Eyes Wide Shut" and "Next Friday" — are nowhere to be found on the nomination list.

In a city the size of Manhattan, it obviously will not be possible for every movie produced to reach our theaters. But perhaps in the course of Carmike's exploitation of Manhattan, it could find a way to replace a few of these flops with movies that have some real appeal.

Carmike officials need to look more closely at the movies they are sending to Manhattan. If they continue to send us movies not worth seeing, we eventually will catch on and start getting our money's worth.

Columnist only joined Phelps' ignorant hatred

Editor,

As I checked my daily dose of area newspapers this morning I noticed Jeff Elliott's column. I was happy to see you have taken it upon yourself to tell your fellow students of the atrocities of Fred Phelps. In fact, I already was thinking of writing to you and congratulating you on such great aspirations.

Then, you started rambling about sin and sodomy and other abominations, and I lost track of where your "great" points were going. As you might know, the University of Kansas feels much differently.

In 1969, KU became one of the first universities to implement a non-discrimination policy based on sexual orientation. This is a distinction we have kept in the highest esteem ever since. As a student senator at KU and an active member of the gay community here, I carry on this torch, seeking to end discrimination in any way I can. With people with ideas such as yours, I obviously have a lot of work to do.

Presently, we're attempting to pass an amendment to the Kansas Board of Regents' non-discrimination policy, much like your campus and my campus' policy. This would make it illegal for any institution in Kansas under the regents' jurisdiction to discriminate in regards to admission and participation. As of yet, K-State has not taken a positive role in this fight. In fact, they seldom take any role and are passive in most political arenas, but I won't go into that.

Your attempt to convince everyone the Bible says anything, much less that it says homosexuality is wrong, actually is troublesome for your newspaper. Being supported by student fees, which everyone enrolled must pay, you cannot, by law, endorse or preach any religious message. It is clear to me, as I think it is to most everyone, this is exactly what you are doing in your column. To quote you, "Proponents of homosexuality can argue all day that same-sex relationships are OK, but if you take a Biblical perspective — this simply is not true." You then continue on your rampage against homosexuals, quoting several biblical passages. As a Christian myself, I can tell you these passages also are flawed, but I won't go into that.

What I suggest for you is to educate yourself. Go to a Queer Straight Alliance meeting. Talk to your colleagues who identify themselves as gay, lesbian or bisexual. Put a face to your hatred. Because now, your column is just as bad, if not worse, as Phelps and his entourage of colorful signs.

PARTY'S OVER

reform needed desperately in dysfunctional party

What happens when you mix an ex-pro wrestler, a real estate tycoon, a self-inflated business man with nothing to do with his money and an unsettled presidential hopeful looking for an arena?

Besides the obvious, Jesse Ventura, Donald Trump, Ross Perot and Pat Buchanan, you get what most in the political system call a spoiler party.

It is doing just that, and it stinks.

The past week has left the Reform Party in the spotlight as the latest political buffoon because of a Nashville, Tenn., meeting that ended in disorderly shouting and scuffling.

By the party's actions, it is safe to say the Reform Party will in no way be the solution to our democracy's trouble.

The story begins by observing the characters. The Reform Party is divided between the Minnesota reformers, led by Minnesota Gov. Ventura and his buddy Trump, and the Dallas reformers, led by Perot and Buchanan.

A difference in beliefs slowly grew from six months ago when Ventura, the highest-ranking elected official in the Reform Party, began to say he would not support Buchanan as the Reform Party presidential nominee.

Friday morning, Ventura announced he was leaving the party due to philosophical reasons (Who would have guessed that ex-pro wrestlers had those?).

"The party is hopelessly dysfunctional," Ventura said.

What's more is the fact the party's choice nominee, Buchanan, is endorsed by David Duke, the well known racist, he said.

Once Ventura was out of the party, it took only a weekend for the factions to divide and conquer. A duel would have been more respectable.

Trump, who never declared candidacy for president but clearly played with the idea publicly, followed Ventura's actions shortly thereafter.

One could speculate Trump's announcement to leave the party came questionably close to the end of his book promotional tour. Others have wondered if the ploy to be play president was for the sole purpose of bringing free press to his casinos.

If he truly was a devoted member of the party, which I believe he wasn't, he won't be missed.

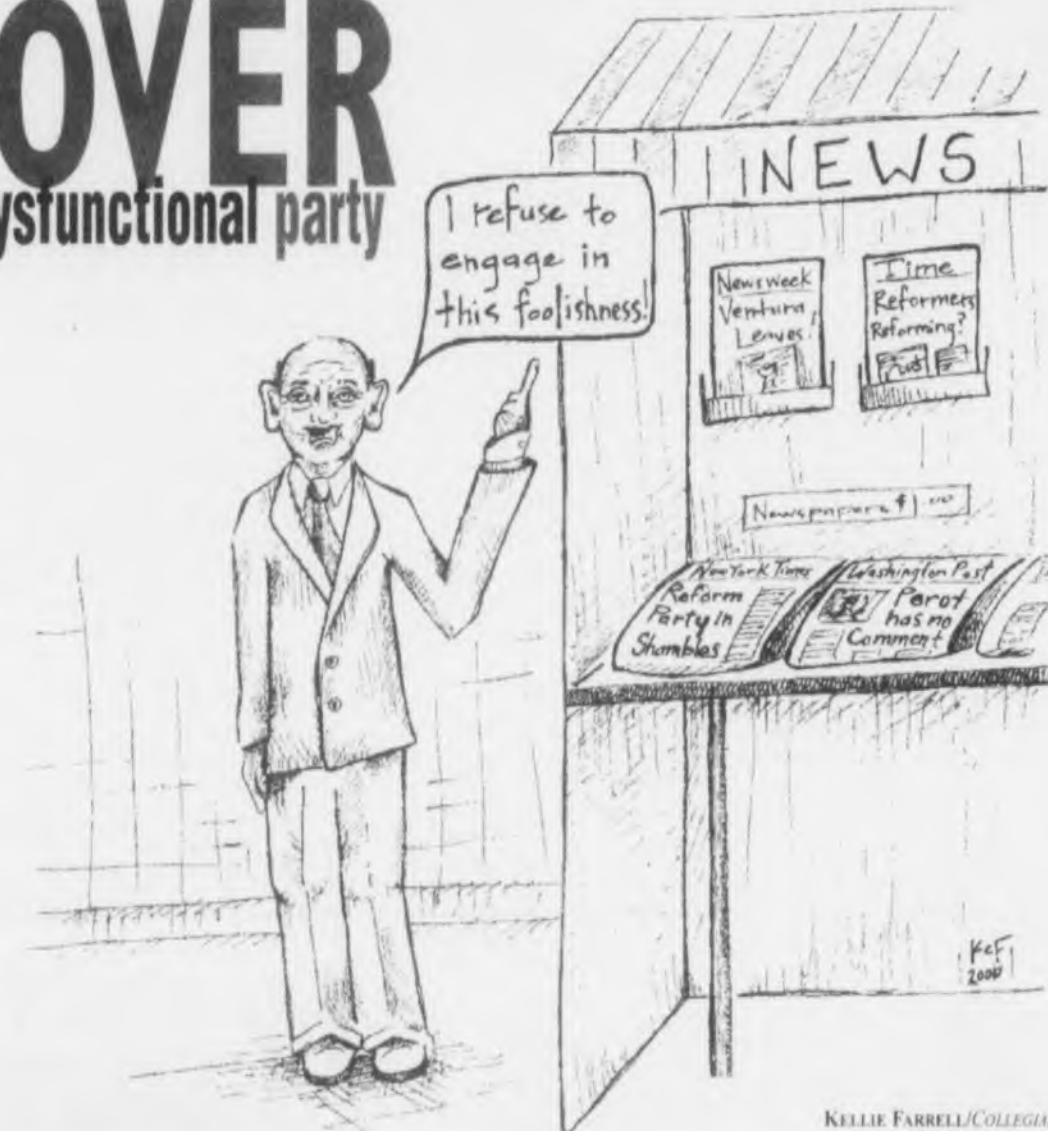

The final act began in a 40-minute climax at the Nashville meeting. A small group of Minnesota reformers still had important party positions, namely the party chairman and the treasurer.

The scene played as follows: Jack Gargan, party chairman, refused to bring the meeting to order because of loud bantering that he should be removed from his positions. He yelled back at the protesting members that he had not called the meeting to order, and therefore the meeting was not legal.

After 40 minutes, the raucous behavior subsided due to the fact that police officers had entered the hotel to monitor the activities.

The meeting was called to order, and Gargan and the sitting treasurer, both allies of the Minnesota faction, were voted out of office.

With the Minnesota upstarts out of the way, the Dallas contingent was free to restructure.

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

The first goal was to do major public relations surgery.

Pat Choate was elected new party chairman and began to make the media rounds.

On "The O'Reilly Factor," Choate tried to plead that the party was headed in a new direction as pictures and sound bites from the Nashville meeting played.

"The Reform Party was led astray for a while, but the members have set us straight and we will be a prominent factor in the presidential election," Choate said.

Words, however, were too little when a screaming woman appeared on the screen pointing her finger across the room at others who disagreed with her.

Decorum was the understatement of the year.

Responding to allegations that the party is a haven for bigots and racists like Duke, Choate said the party has nothing to do with racists and does not accept any endorsements from them.

During the past week's commotion there has been one surprisingly silent individual.

Perot. He has not offered his opinion on any of the activities that have destroyed his party. Admirably, he has allowed the members to solve the internal problems.

His silence, of course, might be sign he is all ears for an opportunity in 2004.

Regardless of any future mishaps, the Reform Party might not get past the recent escapades.

All the chaos that has been part of the Reform Party might be the final curtain call.

The usual role as outside the beltway alternative is played by anti-establishment John McCain and Bill Bradley this year. Even if they were to get together, there isn't any room for them.

The third party always has been the spoiler, and will continue to be this year.

Fried maggot-infested meat smells good, tastes bad

I love to cook. My love of cooking stems from my love of eating — not just any old crap, but good food.

Having grown-up in cosmopolitan Washington, D.C., I had the distinctive opportunity to sample a plethora of various ethnic cuisines: Greek, Italian, Thai, Indian, French, Cajun, Middle Eastern, Vietnamese, Jewish (both Ashkenazic and Sephardic), Spanish, German, Ethiopian, Tex-Mex, authentic Mexican, Chinese, Japanese, Korean, Polynesian and many more. I love them all.

When I go home to visit my parents over winter or summer break, I try to hit as many of these restaurants as is physically possible. Unfortunately, physics is against me, both in the limited amount of time allotted for eating and limited volume of my viscera.

Now that I'm a student in Manhattan, my Epicurean opportunities have been drastically curtailed. There barely are a handful of establishments serving ethnic cuisines within a 120-mile radius. Even still, the Kansas City area is not known for its culinary diversity (although I do know of an Ethiopian restaurant in the West 39th Street District).

Even if I am in a mood for a locally available cuisine, being a student puts me in a situation of destitution. Thus, most of the time I can't afford to eat out (or even just to eat), particularly after I pay for the necessities of life, namely rent and beer.

In order to satisfy my Epicurean desires, I must cook for myself. My personal library of cookbooks outnumbers that of all other books I own on any other single subject. Being an entomologist and considering that there are an estimated 30 million species of insects in the world, I own a crapload of entomology texts, so you can just imagine the enormity of my cookbook collection.

Several summers ago I picked up "The Elegant Taste of Thailand" by Sisamon Kongpan and Pinyo Srisawat.

One of the first recipes I tried was Neua Daet Diao — fried sun-dried beef. I assumed it was some sort of Thai beef jerky. I'm not a big fan of the beef jerky one can purchase at the store and I figured if this was as savory as it looked in the picture, it could be something I could take along when I go out backpacking.

The recipe calls for marinating thinly cut strips of beef in, among other things, garlic, curry, pepper, whiskey and fish sauce (which, for those of you not in the know, is a salty extract of anchovy, and yes, it smells and tastes as repugnant as it sounds. However, using a very tiny bit can bring out the flavor in a very big dish). After letting this concoction sit overnight, the strips of meat are placed in the sun for a full day. When evening comes, the meat is brought in and fried in hot oil.

This sounded tasty enough (in spite of the anchovy juice), so I bought a nice $10 piece of meat, a bottle of Jack Daniels (Black Label, of course) and the various other ingredients I didn't own already (I already had the fish sauce).

That night I mixed the marinade and soaked the meat. Early next morning I put the meat out to dry in the hot summer sun.

Being an entomologist, I was a bit concerned about insects attacking my Neua Daet Diao, but I figured that with all the spices and whiskey and fish sauce soaked into the meat, the insects probably would be kept at bay. After all, this dish is from Thailand, where hundreds of thousands more species of insects exist than in the Midwest. If it's OK to leave beef out to dry in Thailand, it should be OK here.

So I placed the meat out in the morning sun and went about my day.

But that evening when I came back — maggots. Maggots on top of my meat, maggots underneath my meat, maggots inside of my meat. Whatever repellent value the spices and alcohol imparted upon the Neua Daet Diao, the fish sauce more than overwhelmed it as an insect attractant. This was a reminder to me that the people in Thailand consider insects food, too (thus the reason they have no problem leaving their meat outside to dry; it's just more protein, right?).

What was I supposed to do, throw it away? There was about 15 bucks worth of ingredients, plus all that time spent preparing the dish. I would have acquired greater pleasure watching $15 flush down the toilet.

The maggots themselves probably were sterile coming out of the fly, but God only knows what other dead animal or fecal material the mother had visited before alighting upon my Neua Daet Diao.

The next step in the recipe called for the frying in hot oil. Although my other biological assumptions proved wrong (i.e. that the insects will stay away from my food), I do know frying in hot oil will kill anything, even the germs on fecal material. And who knows, maybe all those fly larvae tenderized the meat. So, I started picking off the maggots.

After about 20 minutes of this I realized there just were too many maggots to remove. Being an entomologist, I knew these maggots, besides being mostly protein, also are whatever Neua Daet Diao they happened to consume.

So I decided to just fry up the meat, maggots and all. Thai people eat insects, so what's the big deal? And besides, westerners like to eat shrimp and lobster, and they're just glorified insects themselves.

So I fried the meat and the maggots. The emanating aromas actually smelled pretty good, but when it all was done and I offered my creation to the friends and family that happened to be present, I had no takers.

"Fine," I thought, just more Neua Daet Diao for me. So I sampled some and do you know what? It didn't taste all that good.

Preach it, brother Nick. Being a basketball player right now takes guts and courage.

If people want to see romantic movies in Manhattan, they go to the back room at Video Express.

I think the Anthony Middle School team could definitely take K-State's basketball team.

A strip mall is exactly what this city does not need. People need to start thinking about 10 years from now rather than one year from now.

I just want to congratulate Jeff Elliott on his column. In today's liberal world, it is a rare virtue to be able to stand up for what you believe in.

Forget about the library. I want a freaking Coke.

Manhattan crew teams unite to 'Row for Humanity'

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State rowing teams are helping the less fortunate by doing what they love, said Seiji Ikeda, collegiate varsity men's coach.

To raise money for the campus chapter of Habitat for Humanity, K-State rowing teams joined forces to "Row for Humanity."

The fourth annual, two-day fund-raiser involved K-State's women's varsity crew team, the men's club team, Manhattan High School's junior rowing program, faculty, coaches and people involved with Habitat for Humanity. The total rowing force included 103 people.

"We were looking for a fund-raiser that both the men and women's teams could do together that would also benefit a worthy cause," Ikeda, director of the event, said.

For 10 hours on Tuesday and Wednesday between 8 a.m. and 6 p.m., rowers traded hard work for cash.

Participants sought out the help of the community by asking for donations in either flat sums or for every 100 meters rowed.

The projected goal was to raise $12,000, but Ikeda said they probably would raise close to $8,300.

While they did fall short of their goal, they raised more than previous years. The average amount raised in the past was $7,500.

"It is a big fund-raiser for all the teams," said Chet Savage, representative of the women's crew team. "And it's the biggest check Habitat for Humanity gets annually."

He said the average Habitat fund-raiser brings in about $300 to $500.

Ikeda said that while each participant was required to row for an hour, many chose to give even more time, rowing up to three hours more than required.

"They are enthusiastic about it," Ikeda said. "It is one of the only means that they can use their sport to help others."

Ten percent of all proceeds are given to Habitat for Humanity, and what is left is divided equally between the men's club, which includes the junior team, and women's crew. In addition, any money raised by a Habitat rower is donated to the organization in full.

"The benefit is our athletes get to be involved in a worthwhile community service project," Jenny Hale, women's varsity crew coach, said.

She said the event was good exposure for the team.

"It's good exposure for us on campus, and we're always looking for exposure," Hale said.

Left, Keili White, sophomore in architecture, participates in a fund-raiser for Habitat for Humanity, sponsored by the men's and women's crew teams. White is a novice rower on the women's rowing team. Far left, The women's crew team takes its turn rowing Tuesday evening in the Union Courtyard to raise money for Habitat for Humanity. More than 100 people participated with the goal of raising $12,000.

Eating disorders, body perception focus of awareness, prevention week

By SARAH SOURK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 80 percent of women are unhappy with the appearance of their body, Heather White, senior in social work, said.

White is one of the main organizers of campus activities during National Eating Disorder Awareness and Prevention week. The week began Monday, and activities at K-State will come to an end today.

Suzie Solenberger, graduate student in kinesiology and coordinator of the life program, also played a big role in planning the Eating Disorder Awareness and Prevention week.

The week often is overlooked, Solenberger said.

"We have a goal to increase awareness and provide information for those with eating disorders," she said.

Solenberger gained experience in this field through an internship with an eating disorder clinic in Australia. Her career goal is to be a dietitian, specifically in the treatment of eating disorders.

White said an informational booth was set up in the K-State Student Union this week for The Great Jeans Give Away. White said people donate old jeans, which later will be sold, and all profits will benefit the Eating Disorder and Awareness Prevention Project.

This booth also offered a resource packet offering information on eating disorders.

Charlotte Ransom, graduate student in foods and nutrition, said The Great Jean Give Away has been a success, with more than 50 pairs donated.

White said her goal simply was to bring awareness to campus.

"All campuses have it. It is a societal problem, not just in Kansas or K-State," White said. "Women do not want to talk about it — we look at ourselves and all the strange things we do."

White said many organizations on campus have been helpful. The women's studies classes have volunteered along with greek houses and other students.

She said the volunteers all were female, which wasn't intended.

Ransom, one of the volunteers, helped prepare packets and pamphlets to distribute to organizations on campus. She also volunteered to sit at the Eating Disorder Awareness Booth in the Union.

"I have seen a lot of people struggle with it," Ransom said. "I think it is more of a problem than people realize. Eating disorders and body perception is a huge problem for college women."

White said she has wanted a speaker to come to campus for a long time.

Dana Staraze, motivational speaker, is scheduled to speak at 7 tonight in the Union Main Ballroom. White said Staraze, who lost one of her sisters to an eating disorder, will focus on looking at the lives and images of the people affected by eating disorders in a new way.

to the .500 mark and even closer to the showdown Saturday with Kansas.

Against Colorado (7-16, 2-10), the K-State guards continued their strong play from three-point range. Wildcat guards Kim Woodlee and Kristin Rethman each hit three treys. Off the bench, K-State also received a spark from point guard April Sailors, who had four three-pointers and led the team with 16 points.

In the first half, K-State shot 50 percent from three-point range and were 47 percent from field-goal range. Colorado, on the other hand, shot 33 percent from field-goal range, and the two teams entered halftime tied 26-26.

The second half saw K-State continue its sharpshooting ways, as the team shot 75 percent from three-point range.

K-State also won the battle of the boards, out-rebounding Colorado 36 to 28. The Cats were led in rebounding by forward Nicky Ramage, who had nine boards and ended the game with seven points.

Scoring-wise, the Cats had a good mix from the inside and outside positions. Center Olga Firsova had 11 points and grabbed five rebounds, and K-State's inside players were able to hold Colorado center Britt Hartshorn to 13 points. Colorado shot only 35 percent from the field in the game.

K-State continues its road trip Saturday, when it takes on Kansas at 3 p.m. in Lawrence.

Title IX legislation deals with more than athletics

Does anybody really know what Title IX is?

There is a misconception that the Title IX Education Amendments of 1972 were created to bring about equality in athletics and public educational institutions.

In truth, the legislation was created to offer equal educational opportunities, including but not limited to athletic opportunities, for women and men.

The National Organization for Women and NOW Legal Defense and Education Fund offers a good summary of the amendment: "No person ... shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving federal financial assistance."

Contrary to popular belief, this legislation is not simply about having proportionate numbers of each gender involved in athletics. It was created, according to Women's Studies Program head Jackie Spears, because women were not getting the same education as men, as recently as the 1970s.

Pregnancy was one issue leading to the need for such legislation; pregnant students could be denied education during their pregnancy, and on the other end of the educational spectrum, teachers were not allowed to teach beyond the third month of pregnancy.

In the pre-Title IX days, women were prepared to be receptionists or homemakers. Female students were told that classes such as calculus would not be useful; instead, they should take typing courses.

This meant women were at a significant disadvantage for higher education and high-paying jobs.

There were enough women in contact with lawmakers in the federal government that Title IX was passed as an addition to an annual reauthorization act for educational funding. If schools wanted government money, this act stipulated the requirements they needed to follow.

While the NCAA has taken notice of Title IX, many or most schools still are not compliant regarding athletics. Current action mostly involves women around the country suing their university when they see blatant discrimination. One example is the University of Kansas' Marian Washington, who sued and won to make the same salary as Roy Williams.

Women, particularly women like Spears, who have been involved in education either as a student or teacher before, during and after the passing of Title IX, note marked progress since the legislation.

However, Spears also said the general resistance to equality in athletics perhaps indicates a desire to hold on to sports as the last bastion of male ownership.

This certainly explains why, 25 years after the implementation of Title IX, few public universities have complied in athletics. But it doesn't justify the reactive rather than proactive approach these schools have taken.

Many schools only rectify the situation after they are sued.

Since the passing of Title IX, K-State has changed many policies. When Spears attended school, women only could participate in intramural sports if they were affiliated with a living group, like sororities or residence halls.

"By the time we got to college we were just so accustomed to the fact that there weren't any opportunities we just stopped talking about it," Spears said, regarding a lack of opportunities for women to participate in athletics at the university level when she was in school in the late 1960s.

Today, students and administration now discuss the differences in opportunities. But intercollegiate athletics still remain behind the times.

In 1995, 71 percent of intercollegiate athletes at K-State were men and 29 percent were women. This is not representative of the student body population, which in 1995 was 53 percent male, 47 percent female. There is good news, though—in 1995, K-State also created a Title IX Compliance Report and Implementation Plan to help resolve this issue.

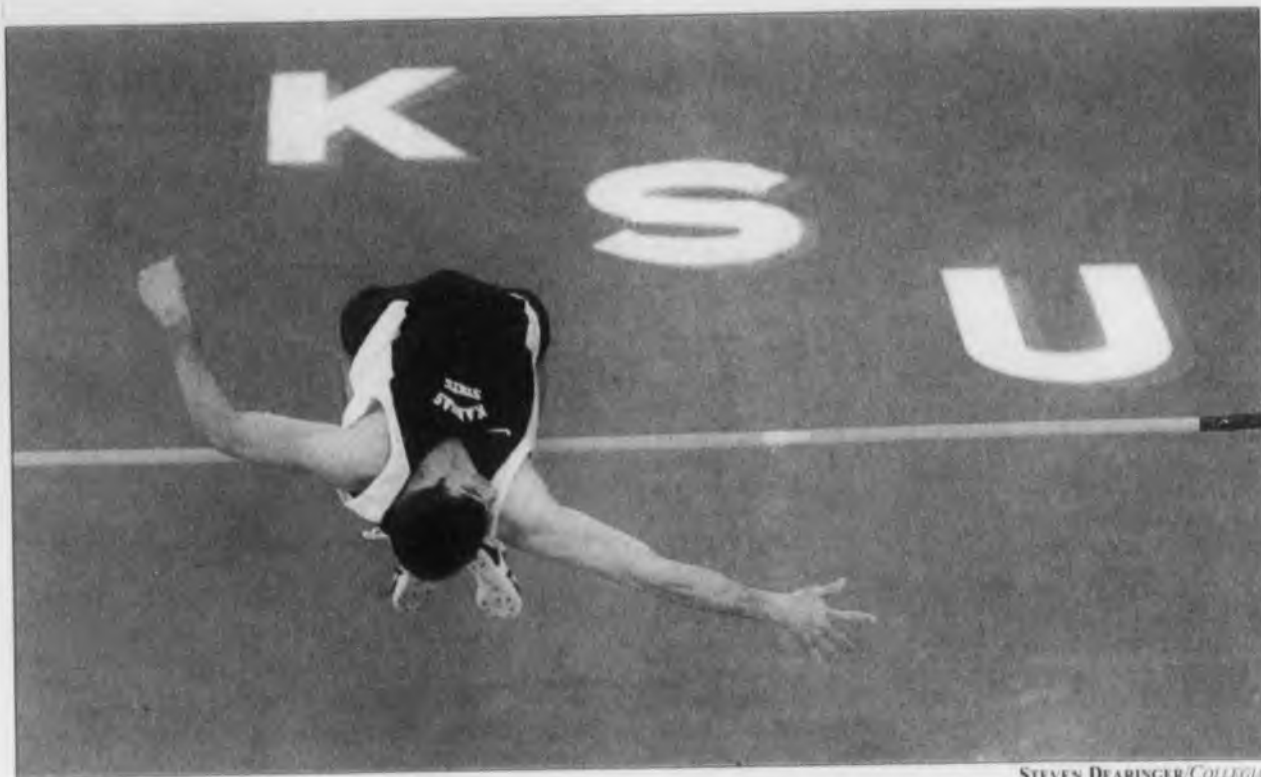

K-State, like other schools dominant in football, exemplifies the conflict that many have used to justify the reactive approach. Football helps to make the numbers uneven because there really isn't a women's sport comparable in athlete numbers.

Administration at K-State does not wish to cut any more men's sports, so the problem becomes that of funding; funding that is ample for football programs across the nation, but much harder to find for a new women's sport. Should the efforts of a brilliant man like head coach Bill Snyder be thwarted to bring about equality?

Many people say no. The federal government, however, said "yes" 25 years ago. It's time for the rest of the nation to follow through and offer women the same opportunities across the board as men.

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics has announced that, by the end of the semester, there will be a decision made regarding a new women's sport. This is a step in the right direction, and readers can look for further installments regarding the specifics of Title IX at K-State.

Trackster Tune-up

Cats prepare for upcoming Big 12 Championship meet

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It was a tune-up for the Cats on Wednesday.

The K-State track and field team was host to the KSU Open, with schools from a variety of different conferences.

K-State coaches and athletes said it was a good opportunity for them to get in some extra work, extra work a week and a half before the Big 12 Indoor Championships at Iowa State.

Senior pole vaulter and high jumper Erin Anderson said it was an unusual meet.

"I would say it is more of a tune-up kind of a deal. We aren't used to having a meet on Friday and Saturday, and then having a meet in the middle of the week," Anderson said.

Senior thrower Anna Whitham said it was a good opportunity to ease up on the rigorous travel schedule. She ended up winning the weight throw with a throw of 62 feet, 10 1/2 inches.

Whitham said her performance in the weight throw was by no means outstanding.

"Not very well, it was an average throw," Whitham said. "I'm disappointed with it, and it was average."

She did say it was good to have one more meet before conference.

"It is good to get some more marks in without having to travel. They were having a tennis meet here this weekend, so if we wanted to go to a meet, we would probably have to travel," Whitham said. "It is all one week before conference."

Anderson said she already has qualified for the indoor nationals, and she said it was difficult for her to get her body going for the meet.

"I went to class this morning (Wednesday), then I came over and I was kind of like, come on body, let's go, we gotta meet," Anderson said. "It was so close to our meet, and I think some people are a little sore yet."

Assistant track and field coach Randy Cole said it was a different type of meet.

"It is a meet that doesn't have the team scoring aspect of it. You have them work on a few things with their jumps, and maybe work on their own individual event," Cole said.

Anderson said it was a chance for her to get the bad jumps out. Track and field is a sport where a great deal of time is spent refining minute techniques to gain those precious inches that can make or break a season. For Anderson, it was another opportunity to perfect her events.

"It was a chance to get the bad jumps out, I guess. It gives me a better idea of what I need to do for conference," Anderson said.

"It is harder to get that intensity up in practice, so at least in a meet you get a better job of what you need to work on before practice."

Whitham said she has some things to work on before the Big 12 meet.

"I felt a little slow today. It was fun because it was unattached, and all the freshman got to throw today," Whitham said.

"I'm going to do some technique work, work on the timing and get ready to have a good time."

Cole said at this point in the season, the team will alter its training style. He said the workloads in practice will be eased off in the next week and cycled properly so the athletes are peaking. He said this meet was a chance for the schools there to prepare.

"It allows every team here to get ready for their conference or region meet," Cole said.

"It is more individual than the team aspect here."

"It gives me an idea of what I need to do for conference."

Local rowers win championship

K-State Rowing Association members brought home first-place team trophies in both the collegiate men and open club events in Saturday's Indoor Rowing Championships at Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence.

The K-State men's crew team earned 73 points in the meet, 22 points better than host Kansas, which finished with 51.

High school rowers from Manhattan and the surrounding area also dominated the club competition, finishing with an overall point total of 95, topping the second-place Kansas City Rowing Club by 36 points.

"In the five years of this competition, we have won numerous individual events, but this is the first time team members have won both team trophies," Al Koch, head coach of the KRSA, said.

In the collegiate men competition, K-State freshman Jesse Bauman placed first in the college novice openweight men's 2000 meters. His time of 6:08.0 is the fastest since Wally Margheim achieved a 6:25 two years ago.

"Jesse is only in his second semester of rowing," Koch said. "He's in really good shape right now. He doesn't have the technical skills yet, but his strength and conditioning are really at a high."

Bauman's performance Saturday follows a 6:15 time recorded in Denver at the Mile High Indoor Rowing Championships on Feb. 5.

"Two weeks in a row with times like that, it just proves that it wasn't a fluke that he got a 6:08," Koch said.

Rowers with times less than six minutes qualify for the U.S. National Team, from which the U.S. Olympic team mainly is selected.

"We're still looking for our first Olympian, and he may be it. He certainly has the potential," he said.

The men's squad also received top performances from senior Jeff Tignor and junior Eric Mabie.

Tignor finished second in the college varsity openweight men's 2000 meters with a time of 6:36.0, and Mabie was runner-up in the college varsity lightweight men's 2000 meters at 6:49.2.

The men's team also placed first and third the College Relay Men's 2000 meters with times of 5:41.6 and 5:57.7, respectively.

KSRA members will next travel to Austin, Texas, during spring break for the "Heart of Texas" regatta.

Looking ahead, Koch said he is hoping to qualify one or more boats for the national meet by placing in the top three at the Midwest Sprints in Madison, Wis.

KC receiver arrested for felony theft

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OLATHE, Kan. — Kansas City wide receiver Andre Rison was arrested Wednesday afternoon on a charge of felony theft.

Rison was released after posting $2,000 bond on a felony charge of stealing music equipment, Lt. Steve Quigg of the Johnson County Sheriff's Department said. The equipment had been rented, but not returned, authorities said.

Rison, who played a diminished role with the Chiefs last season after resurrecting his career with the club in 1997, was to appear in court Feb. 29, Quigg said.

Rison denied the charge. "It was someone else," he said. "They elected not to return it, so they had to come up with me."

Rison, who was suspended for one game in November after his involvement in a fight outside a midtown bar, had 21 catches for 218 yards and no touchdowns last season.

Rison, who has played for Atlanta, Cleveland, Jacksonville and Green Bay in his 11-year career, also was arrested in April 1997 in Lawrenceville, Ga., for disorderly conduct when he refused to get out of a car after a traffic stop.

Rison's role was reduced last season as tight end Tony Gonzales became the favorite target of quarterback Elvis Grbac and wide receiver Derrick Alexander became the main big-play threat.

Leadership program brings area high schoolers to KSU

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas high school students will be flocking to K-State today for the opportunity to discuss leadership skills with K-State faculty, students and their own peers from across the state.

The 12th annual leadership program, "Leadership 2000: Turning Vision into Action," will be from 8:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. today. Cory Epler, co-coordinator for the event, said students will have the chance to attend leadership skills sessions in the morning, which will discuss topics ranging from choosing a college and a major to ethics and diversity.

In the afternoon, students will be split into 20 groups and participate in breakout sessions, where they will exchange ideas and share what they learned.

"We are wanting to provide an outlet to students so that they can develop their leadership skills," Epler said. "This gives students the chance to interact with other student leaders and to share their ideas with students from throughout the state."

Epler said the program gives high school students the opportunity to attend a one-day conference and learn from leadership skills sessions, as well as share ideas with other student leaders in the state. The program is sponsored by the Blue Key senior honorary, the Division of Continuing Education and the Office of Leadership Studies and Programs.

"We looked for a wide range of people to come and speak at the conference," Epler said. "We want the students to hear the best people on each subject so that they can learn from one another."

Kris Meiergerd, co-coordinator for the event, said the breakout sessions will be led by members of Blue Key, faculty members and student leaders on campus. The sessions will feature activities that build on what was learned during the morning discussions and will offer students the chance to share ideas and receive feedback from the rest of the group.

"By attending this conference, students will be able to be introduced to college life and receive insight on what is possible for them in the future," Meiergerd said. "They will gain knowledge from the speakers and presentations as well as have the opportunity to become motivated by others' experiences."

Epler said Bernard Franklin will deliver a speech during the luncheon at noon.

He is nationally known for his work in the area of student leadership training and student activity planning.

Franklin also was the first black student-body president at K-State and the first to win by a write-in campaign. Keith Loy, the keynote speaker, will close the conference and will cover a number of leadership-related topics.

Loy's speech will be at 2 p.m. in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union. The speech is open to all K-State students and faculty as well as those attending the leadership program.

"The students who come will have the chance to take what they learned here back to their own organizations and make them more productive," Epler said. "They will be able to hear other experiences and become able to look and bring back ideas they can implement at their own schools."

Meiergerd said this year's program had to be limited to 500 students because of renovations in the Union.

He said in the past few years, the program has grown, and he said he thinks it will continue to grow in the future.

"K-State has grown so much in popularity through our athletic programs and the increase in the number of students who have enrolled," Meiergerd said. "Students across the state have become more aware of the university and the leadership program and have heard what can be gained from attending."

"We have received such a positive response in the past, we hope that the limited number this year won't affect next year's response."

"By attending this conference, students will be able to be introduced to college life and receive insight on what is possible for them in the future."

Security forces, citizens clash in India

By QAISER MIRZA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SRINAGAR, India — Security forces burned cars and beat people with sticks and rifle butts in the capital of Kashmir on Wednesday after militants gunned down three officers.

The violence began in downtown Srinagar when gunmen shot and killed two members of the Border Security Force in the busy central market of Lal Chowk.

Reinforcements moved in quickly, hitting people with rifle butts and sticks and firing their guns in the air.

The two soldiers were making purchases in a shop when the gunmen fired on them at close range and grabbed their guns, said R.P. Singh, deputy inspector-general of the Border Security Force. He said a policeman chased the gunmen and was fatally shot at close range with a pistol.

Kashmir policemen moved in and began beating people while Border Security Force officers set several cars on fire and smashed dozens of windows.

About 5,000 people fled their shops and homes along four downtown streets and headed for other parts of Srinagar.

Many men and women were pulled from restaurants, shops or houses and taken away for questioning.

Witnesses said security officers dragged a bus conductor out of his vehicle and beat him repeatedly. Three young men were beaten and dragged into a security vehicle as they shouted that they only were shopkeepers.

A dozen shops on one street were burned down, witnesses said, but it wasn't clear who was responsible.

The violence stopped when Singh and Rajinder Kumar, deputy inspector-general of the Kashmir police, arrived.

The confrontation in the busiest part of Srinagar reflected the increasing boldness of attacks on Indian security forces from insurgents seeking Kashmir's separation from India.

Kashmir is the only predominantly Muslim region in mostly Hindu India and has been the center of a 10-year insurgency by several militant groups fighting for independence or union with Pakistan. The government security forces sent to counter the insurgents have been accused repeatedly of human rights abuses, and hundreds of cases have been filed.

Huang says Gore's visit not to raise funds

By LARRY MARGASAK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Vice President Al Gore's 1996 appearance at a Buddhist temple was never a fund-raising matter, an ex-Democratic money raiser said Wednesday in testimony that supported Gore's original explanation of the event.

John Huang, testifying at the trial of fellow fund-raiser Maria Hsia, said Gore was to attend a separate money-raising event the same day on the Los Angeles trip. The fund-raising appearance was canceled because of the vice president's tight schedule, Huang told a U.S. District Court jury.

In consolidating the two planned appearances into one, Huang said a luncheon — originally to be part of the fund-raiser at a restaurant — was moved to the community outreach event at the Hsi Lai Temple. "The event at the temple ... was never a fund-raising matter," Huang said.

In a trial that mirrors an event that has dogged Gore in his current run for the presidency, Hsia is charged with five felony counts of causing false statements to be filed with the Federal Election Commission about the true source of campaign donations. Prosecutors have described the immigration consultant's actions as a scheme to illegally reimburse contributors for more than $100,000 in donations they made to the Clinton-Gore 1996 re-election campaign and the Democratic Party.

Huang testified Tuesday that Hsia gave him an envelope with $100,000 in donations after the appearance at the temple in Hacienda Heights, Calif., on April 29, 1996. Both Huang and Hsia were key Democratic Party fund-raisers in the Asian-American community.

To demonstrate that there originally were two separate events, Hsia lawyer Nancy Luque showed Huang his invitations to the restaurant. Huang said he had sent some out before the event was canceled.

Huang's description of the temple appearance as a community outreach event matched the description originally used by Gore. More recently, Gore has said, "I have acknowledged my mistake in attending" the event.

Most schools have Internet connections

By ANJETTA McQUEEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Nearly every public school in America has an Internet connection, with access jumping from a little more than one-third of schools to 95 percent in just five years, the Education Department said Wednesday.

The rapid expansion from 1994 to 1999, school technology supporters say, is due to everything from increased donations by technology companies eager to train future workers to Clinton administration efforts such as the E-rate program — funded by a special fee on phone bills — that helps provide discounted Internet connections for schools and libraries.

"Technology can improve student performance and provide the competitive skills necessary for future success," Education Secretary Richard Riley said. "It is critical that we provide a link for those in the smallest towns to the largest cities."

Edith McArthur, a department demographer who conducted the study, said: "It looks like schools are actually responding to the recognized need for access. There's a lot of pressure to connect."

The connecting appears to have brought the Internet to more school-children, she said.

In 1999, on average there were nine students for every one instructional computer with Internet access nationwide. The previous year, on average, the ratio was 12 students for each such computer, the report said.

The E-rate program has committed more than $3.6 billion in the past two years to assist schools and libraries in paying for discounted Internet connections. Officials say the program has helped connect more than 1 million classrooms to the Internet, mostly by helping them pay for internal wiring.

The money comes from fees imposed on telecommunications companies, which pass them on to customers in phone bills.

States also have pumped funds into computers, telecommunications and Internet access.

Critics worry that the momentum could wane as policy makers realize the high cost of such technology. Louisiana, for example, gave school districts $38 million for technology in 1997-98. The next year it gave $25 million, and for 1999-2000, the districts received $14 million.

Access still differs among types of schools. Students were more likely to have to share access in larger schools, where the ratio was 10:1; in the smallest schools, that ratio was six students for every computer with the Internet.

Poor students and those in large cities also were more likely to share Internet access.

"We need to continue our efforts to ensure that all schools and students have equal access to the vast network of information on the Internet," Riley said.

President Clinton, who has set a goal of connecting all Americans to the Internet, not just classrooms and libraries, has proposed for the fiscal 2001 budget a $2 billion tax incentive package over 10 years, as well as $380 million in expanded federal grants, to encourage the private sector to donate computers, sponsor community technology centers and train workers.

Researchers say schools provide Internet access to their pupils in varying ways.

For example, some schools have large computer labs that give students individual time on the Internet during their school day.

"Typically what happens is that Access still differs among types of schools. Students were more likely to share access in larger schools, where the ratio was 10:1.

teachers tend to let kids rotate through for whatever they are doing," McArthur said.

Classroom computer hookups have increased 20-fold since 1994, from 3 percent to 63 percent.

Public schools also upgraded their network connections and the speed at which they are able to connect. By 1999, schools were six times as likely to use faster dedicated-line networks (63 percent) or other high-speed technologies (23 percent), than simply dial-up connections (14 percent).

The survey was based on a nationally representative sample of about 1,000 public elementary and secondary schools in fall 1999. The margin of error is plus or minus 1 to 3 percentage points.

The survey also found that 39 percent of classrooms in high-poverty schools have Internet access, while 74 percent of classrooms in low-poverty schools are connected to the Internet.

Tobacco growers sue cigarette industry for $69 billion

By PHILIP BRASHER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Tobacco farmers sued cigarette makers Wednesday for $69 billion, contending they conspired to undo the federal system that regulates tobacco prices.

The class-action case argues that the companies, led by Philip Morris Inc., misled farmers into helping them stop congressional legislation in 1998 that would have given growers $28 billion. The companies later reached a settlement with the states that will provide growers with much less — $5.15 billion over 12 years.

The lawsuit has 4,010 plaintiffs who grow tobacco or own federal tobacco quotas, the licenses that a farmer either must own or rent to sell the crop. There are about 500,000 farmers and quota holders nationwide.

"All we're asking for and all we've ever asked for ... is to be treated fairly. We haven't been treated fairly," said Lamar DeLoach, a Metter, Ga., grower.

Attorneys general of 14 tobacco-growing states are listed as co-conspirators in the lawsuit along with a Philip Morris lobbyist because of their role in getting the settlement.

The lawsuit opens a new legal front for the manufacturers, who last week were sued by a group of wholesalers who accused them of fixing prices.

The companies deny any wrongdoing in either case. Jay Poole, a spokesman for Philip Morris, said the growers' lawsuit was a direct assault on the states' settlement with the industry.

"Some lawyer has convinced a group of farmers that there is a pot of gold at the end of this litigation," Poole said.

Alexander Pires, the farmers' attorney, pledged to break the tobacco companies unless they pay their fair share to the growers.

Pires, who sued McDonald's in the famous coffee-scalding case, won a settlement last year in a racial discrimination case lawsuit against the Agriculture Department that is expected to cost the government $1 billion. He has a similar lawsuit pending against USDA on behalf of American Indian growers.

Tobacco farmers have seen their income decline sharply in recent years because of declining consumption and increased imports of cheaper foreign leaf. Since 1997, the amount of tobacco farmers are allowed to grow under the quota system has been reduced by more than half. Small-scale farms that must rent allotments have been especially hard hit.

USDA fixes the quotas each year based on the companies' purchasing intentions, exports and stocks.

The farmers who are suing the industry say the companies want to do away with the quota system and contract directly with a select number of producers.

The legislation that the growers helped the industry to defeat was intended to settle state lawsuits against the companies. The settlement they reached with the states will cost $206 billion. The farmers say the companies made vague promises to take care of them if they lobbied against the legislation.

Other farmers are opposed to the lawsuit, instead preferring to negotiate with the companies.

"We don't think it's time to give up yet," said Danny McKinney, chief executive officer of the Burley Tobacco Grower's Cooperative in Lexington, Ky. "You don't bite the hand that feeds you."

FAMILY food ties

Old-fashioned home cooking draws crowds

By KRISTEN DYMACEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

To find home cooking and family, students often have to wait for the holidays.

Grizzly's offers both, so students won't have to wait until the next holiday break.

The Smith family owned-and-operated restaurant offers a selection of daily specials, sandwiches, soups and pies. Grizzly's, which originally opened in Pratt, Kan., got its name from a TV character, Rosalie Smith, co-owner, said.

"Grizzly was my husband, Craig's, nickname," Smith said. "People said he looked a lot like Grizzly Adams. We thought Grizzly's was a lot catchier name for a restaurant than Smith."

She said Grizzly's, located in the Plaza West Shopping Center off of Anderson Avenue, always has had Smith family members working in the restaurant. Eight of their 10 family members now help by waiting on tables, hosting, cooking and cleaning at the restaurant.

Customers have started to notice all of the family help, she said.

Angelina Smith, Grizzly's waitress, refills June Karsmizki's coffee. Karsmizki said she and her husband, Ray, eat at the restaurant on a regular basis. "The food is so good you can't help it," she said.

"Customers seem to really like the fact that it's a family place," Rosalie Smith said. "We get a lot of compliments about the kids and that they are a part of the restaurant."

Emilie Smith, daughter and sophomore in pre-dentistry, said customers are curious and try to figure out which employees are a part of the family.

"They always ask the help if they are one of the daughters," she said.

Rosalie Smith said there are advantages to having the family work together.

"A lot of families go different directions when they go to work," she said. "But with us, if we're not at home together, then we're at work together."

Besides all of the family help, another characteristic of Grizzly's is the amount of bears used as decoration, Angelina Smith, daughter, said.

"There are a lot of grizzly bears," she said. "But we have a lot of different kinds of bears, also."

Rosalie Smith said a lot of their customers help with the decorating.

"People think of us when they see a grizzly bear," she said. "Customers give us bears all the time to decorate."

The bears, and family members aren't the only reasons people come to Grizzly's, Rosalie Smith said.

Grizzly's is open from 11 a.m. to 9 p.m. Monday through Thursday and 11 a.m. to 10 p.m. Friday and Saturday, offering a variety of daily specials. The specials include ham and beans, chicken and noodles, meatloaf, lasagna and hot beef.

The specials come with a choice of salad or pie. There are nine to 10 varieties of pie from which to choose.

In addition to the specials, such as sandwiches and hamburgers, complete dinners are available.

Emilie Smith said even though the portions are large, there are portion sizes for everyone. Customers can choose between the half and whole portions when ordering specials and dinners. They also can build their own plate from the menu.

"Sometimes people will think we brought out the wrong size because the portions are so big," Emilie Smith said. "They'll think we brought out the whole portion instead of the half portion. They're really surprised by the amount of food."

Rosalie Smith said people can expect to eat lunch for around $5 and dinner from $5-$10.

She said the customer base includes not only families, but people on lunch break and college students. All of Grizzly's business comes from their reputation, Rosalie Smith said.

"It's been a word of mouth deal because we don't advertise," she said. "We're gradually getting a larger college crowd because they like the home cooking type of food in the evenings."

Jessica Riffel, sophomore in business administration, said she eats at Grizzly's because the food is similar to what she eats at home.

"The food is really good," Riffel said. "It's just like eating home-cooked meals."

Schela Carlton, Manhattan resident, said she and her husband eat at Grizzly's at least once a week.

"It's not greasy take-out food," Carlton said. "It's just good food."

Rosalie Smith said she thinks customers keep returning because they like the atmosphere and variety of food Grizzly's has to offer.

"They like the fact that it's a hometown restaurant and not a chain," she said. "They really appreciate what we have."

"It's just like eating home-cooked meals."

KC brewery gains popularity in Manhattan

By TARYN FORT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

There are several boulevards available throughout the streets of Manhattan.

The Boulevard Brewing Company has become a common name throughout the college community at K-State. The brewery, based in Kansas City, Mo., was established in 1989 by John R. McDonald.

Traveling throughout Europe in the 1980s brought McDonald to the conclusion that his path to success would be returning to America and making a beer that could be sold to the local area.

Boulevard Brewing Company's sales were up to 20,560 barrels and a gross revenue that hit the $3 million mark by 1995. The brewery no longer is ranked as one of the nation's microbreweries. It now is considered a regional specialty brewery by industry classifications.

Steven Pauwels, head brewer at Boulevard, said the company's sales in Manhattan steadily have increased in the last few years.

"Boulevard sold 20 percent more beer to Manhattan, Kansas, in 1999 than in 1998," Pauwels said. "So many of the bars in Aggieville are offering the beer to college students now. Manhattan bars such as Auntie

Mae's Parlor have begun adding more and more onto their orders in the last year, he said.

Liquor stores in Manhattan have had a constant success with Boulevard products since receiving them in the early 1990s.

"We sold a lot of Boulevard at first because there was a lot of hype surrounding the brewery at that point," said Greg Lowery, general manager of Dean Retail Liquor. "Since, our sales have remained constant and very successful in regard to Boulevard. Out of all the different beers offered, we sell more of the Boulevard Wheat, unfiltered."

The original beer of the brewery is the Boulevard Pale Ale, which the company considers its flagship beer.

As time went by and sales went up, the brewery expanded their menu. The company now offers five beers year round — Pale Ale, Bully! Porter, Wheat Beer (filtered and unfiltered), Dry Stout and Tenpenny Ale.

Seasonal beers also are available.

Irish Ale is offered in the spring. Bob's

47 Lager in the fall and Nutcracker Ale in the winter. An addition is expected by the end of 2000 or early 2001.

The exact time at which the sixth beer will be introduced is still up in the air," Steve Mills, sales manager at Boulevard, said. "The most important element of this sort of a venture is the product itself. We are committed to quality in this business."

The brewery offers weekly tours from 1:30 to 3:30 p.m. each Saturday. The tours are free, but reservations are preferred.

"We try to keep the tour at thirty people, but we usually take forty," Mills said. "The crowd is a mixture of all sorts of people, usually some college kids from the Midwest. Anyone of any age is allowed on the tour, but only those that are 21 are able to drink at the end. Identification is required."

The tour includes the basics of brewing as well as access to the entire plant.

"We try to answer all questions in regard to brewing," Pauwels said. "A sampling of every Boulevard product is also included at the end of the tour, but if you stay too long we will try to put you to work."

Since several of the bars in Aggieville sell Boulevard beer, some even have begun offering specials on certain nights of the week.

Ashley Mason, fifth-year senior in apparel and textiles, and Porter's employee, said the bar offers specials once a week on the Boulevard beers they sell.

"Every Tuesday we have $1.50 Boulevard draws of any of their beers we are currently holding in stock," Mason said. "I usually waitress on Tuesdays and everyone that comes in that night is generally coming in for the Boulevard special."

surpassing their scholarship goals.

Richard Pearson, national chairman for the K-State Scholarship Campaign, said he attributes the successful money-raising efforts to several things including a booming economy and the administration and faculty at the university.

"President Jon Wefald and the rest of the administration have done a wonderful job creating a positive image for K-State," Pearson said. "So many people have done a magnificent job with raising money, and I think it will continue with the same enthusiasm and tenacity as it has done already."

Pearson said the reason it is important to collect donations for the scholarship campaign is to remain competitive with other state universities when recruiting high school students. He said the efforts so far have been fantastic, and he said he sees it continuing throughout the time remaining for the campaign.

"We all know that in order to compete with other major universities for kids in the state, we have to be able to give out full-ride scholarships," Pearson said. "In order to do that, we have to raise a lot of money."

"So far, the campaign has been successful beyond our wildest dreams. There has been no lack of enthusiasm by anyone involved, and we need to continue to get people who came to the university to give back."

cells in the petri dish by varying the length of time the cells are in the culture, Grieger said.

Within the first three weeks, researchers can tell if the cow is pregnant. By this period of time, a significant number of the cows are not pregnant, Grieger said.

By the second trimester, most of the embryos are lost for unknown reasons. The department and Cyagra are experimenting with 20 surrogate mothers, using 20 identical embryos.

"We are currently in the first month of gestation," he said. "It's too early to tell how things will turn out."

Dan Shike, senior in animal science and industry, has helped in the laboratory at Cyagra since December. Although he only does the basic tasks, he said learns a lot about the process.

He had heard from Grieger that Cyagra was looking for part-time help, he said.

Shike was intrigued by the process and the potential of cloning. Shike remarked on the great opportunities to fight cancer and other diseases.

"It's sure unique to be on the cutting edge of technology," Shike said. "This should draw more students to K-State."

Water drained after poison threat

■ 2.5 million gallons emptied into city storm sewer system.

By GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Responding to a threat of poison, 2.5 million gallons of water were drained Wednesday night from Manhattan's Water Treatment Plant into the storm sewer system.

Extensive testing proved the city's drinking water to be clean despite the threat, said Diane Stoddard, acting assistant city manager.

A handwritten note in which someone claimed to have poisoned the drinking water was found by operators in a unisex bathroom shortly before 7 p.m.

The authorities subsequently were alerted, and the entire system was shut down to prevent the transfer of water from the plant to the water towers and distribution system.

Draining the water was one of the precautionary actions taken to prevent the water from being dispersed to the public.

"We took the threat very serious," Stoddard said. "I think our actions demonstrated that we took every precaution to not distribute any possible contaminants that may have been in the water."

Samples from the plant were taken to K-State's Health and Safety Lab, where they were tested for the presence of poison.

The Kansas Department of Health and Environment was alerted of the problem and was on hand for the testing.

The draining of the water created shortages, causing lower water pressure throughout the city. Officials tried to notify the public Wednesday night in hopes of lowering water usage through Thursday afternoon so the plant could regenerate the water supply.

The plant immediately began to bring in new water from the well field to be treated and pumped back into the facility in order to resume normal operation.

Stoddard said the plant resumed normal operating levels as of noon Thursday.

Riley County Police Department has begun a formal criminal investigation to apprehend the author of the note, Stoddard said.

"We were out at the plant last night after the incident," Mike Watson, RCPD director, said. "We talked to people at the plant who have been around and have some pretty good leads to follow up on."

Watson said the person charged with the crime might experience a harsh penalty depending on how the threat is perceived by authorities.

"The offender will go to the county attorney or possibly a United States attorney, since this could be a federal violation," Watson said. "The action could be considered a terroristic threat depending on what the actual crime is defined to be."

The city hopes to never experience a similar situation, Stoddard said, but it is reviewing procedures as a precaution.

"We plan to examine all emergency precautions, hoping to reduce the recurrence of a situation like this," Stoddard said. "We are looking at all the possibilities."

Area teen discovered fatally shot

■ Deputy finds dead student during stop to help with tire.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COUNCIL GROVE, Kan. — A deputy who stopped to help people in a car with a flat tire found a 17-year-old boy fatally shot and at least one more injured.

Scott R. Brown, a junior at Council Grove High School, died Wednesday night after the shooting about 8 p.m. outside a home in northern Lyon County, the Kansas Bureau of Investigation said.

A Morris County deputy had stopped to assist a vehicle Brown was riding in after it blew a tire along U.S. Highway 56, a friend of Brown said.

Two other boys were in a vehicle with Brown at the time. They told authorities they were on their way to Council Grove to get medical help for Brown.

Brown was shot while inside the vehicle, said the Lyon County Sheriff's Department.

A KBI news release Thursday said Brown and two other boys were riding in the vehicle when they encountered an unnamed subject. The release said shots were fired after the boys returned to the home, but did not say what led to the shooting.

Students at Council Grove High School were told of Brown's death Thursday morning.

Brown was a starter for the varsity basketball team, a member of the cross country team and an honor roll student.

"Our thoughts and prayers go out to his family," principal Bob Kiblinger said. Grief counselors would be available to students and faculty, he said.

Friday night's basketball game against Remington would go on as scheduled, Kiblinger said.

Dance funds to go toward house cause

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The House that K-State Built, the university's newest community service committee, is planning build a house in conjunction with Manhattan's chapter of Habitat for Humanity.

Mary Bosco, co-chairwoman for the committee, said the goal is to bring all facets of the campus community together to complete a common goal.

"We are trying to make this a campus event bringing together students from every campus organization," Bosco said. "This is for a good cause, and the purpose is to keep the main goal in mind — we want to have two houses by next spring."

Bosco said the committee's monetary goal is $45,000, but she said it wants it to be an all-campus philanthropy. She said two groups often try to raise money for one organization, and it tends to turn into a competition between the two groups.

"This is a group of concerned students who want to do something good and work toward a common goal," Bosco said. "We want this to be the biggest social-service event of the year and break down some of the barriers between campus groups."

Bosco said almost 30 students representing the Student Governing Association, Union Program Council, Black Student Union, Interfraternity Council, Panhellenic Council and other campus organizations already have committed to work on the project.

The house, to break ground next spring, will be dedicated to the memory of Nancy Bennett. Bennett, who died last fall from injuries resulting from being struck by lightning, was the wife of K-State football defensive coordinator Phil Bennett.

Matt Wildman, co-chairman for the committee, said when the committee decided to dedicate the house, it wanted to find a local community member to whom people could relate.

"She was a person who students and Manhattan could recognize," Wildman said. "We thought it would be a nice tribute to her memory."

Perhaps the biggest fund-raiser en route to the $45,000 goal is the dance-a-thon. It

Student to cycle to Washington, D.C., for disabled children

CLIF PALMBERG/COLLEGIAN

Matt Keller, sophomore in criminology, will be participating in the Journey of Hope bicycle tour to raise awareness for people with developmental disabilities. The tour, which runs from June until August, starts at San Francisco and ends in Washington, D.C.

By CLIF PALMBERG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One K-State student will pedal coast-to-coast this summer to raise nationwide awareness for people with disabilities.

Matt Keller, sophomore in criminology, will participate in the Journey of Hope bicycle tour. The 63-day tour will begin June 11 in San Francisco and will end in Washington, D.C.

"Everything that I ever heard about this is that it's the greatest thing you can do," Keller said.

The tour is a project for PUSH America, the national philanthropy for the Pi Kappa Phi fraternity, of which Keller is a member.

Journey of Hope began in 1977 with one rider raising awareness for people with developmental disabilities.

The tour has become a national event for PUSH America, with 60 riders participating this year.

Keller is not the first K-State student to ride in the tour. His brother, Larry, participated in the event, as well as Phil Beatty, senior in speech pathology.

"I think it is a great opportunity for him," Beatty said. "It is an incredible opportunity to meet people with all different disabilities."

Beside riding bicycles, the tour involves many activities for people with disabilities. These include dancing events, going to water parks and a puppet show, "Kids on the Block," in which each puppet will have a different disability.

The tour also is designed to raise awareness, and last year an estimated 14 million people were in contact with the tour.

"We try to reach out to the cities the best we can to spread the word about people with disabilities," Keller said.

To join the tour, much is asked of the participants. Each rider must raise $4,000 to enter the philanthropy, which also has an application and interview process to select participants.

In less than one month of fund-raising, Keller has raised $2,500, which was generated mainly from mailings to family and friends.

"Once I got to the $2,500 mark, it just seemed to stop," Keller said. "But there are many different ways I can raise the money."

Keller plans on approaching alumni, President Jon Wefald, deans and coaches, and has other ideas for raising money.

He is growing his hair out and later is going to ask for donations to shave his head from other members of his fraternity.

Keller also plans on asking for donations from sororities, and he will put the letters of the highest donating house on his bicycle helmet.

Challenges other than raising money also lie ahead for Keller. Physical preparation for the tour must begin months in advance.

"I trained a lot over break, but so far, this semester has been killing me," Keller said.

Keller has been exercising at Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex until the weather warms up.

"He is going to have to climb three different mountain ranges, and ride 100 miles or more a day for nine days straight. He is going to have head winds, rain and all different elements to deal with," Beatty said. "It is going to really push him to his physical limits to cross the country."

Rain or shine, Keller said he looks forward to the experience.

"If I can get it done — it's got to be an incredible feeling," Keller said. "It is the excitement of doing something for someone else, finally."

Keller will continue to raise money until April 28. For more information, contact Keller at 395-1515.

$54,000 loss fuels city to lobby for sales-tax policy on Internet

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Officials say Internet business already has cost the city of Manhattan roughly $54,000 in 1999, and the problem is growing.

The estimated loss was not all that surprising, Diane Stoddard, acting assistant city manager, said, but it helps the city and others make a case against the legislation that might be responsible.

In October 1998, the Internet Tax Freedom Act was passed, establishing a moratorium that outlaws state and local taxes against some Internet businesses for a three-year period.

As a result, Stoddard said the city is working with others on an intergovernmental resolution against the moratorium. The resolution already has been approved by the city and Manhattan-Ogden USD 383, she said, with K-State, Riley County and the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce expected to join.

Commissioner Carol Peak said the resolution is planned to be presented to local congressional delegates during the March 10-14 National League of Cities meeting in Washington, D.C. Peak said that as far as she knows, all five members of the commission plan to attend the meeting.

Stoddard said the moratorium was intended to protect the growing field of Internet commerce, but cities like Manhattan lose revenue as residents buy more and more items without paying the area's 5.9- to 6.9-percent sales taxes. With the Advisory Commission on Electronic Commerce rumored to have no solid recommendation for its report to Congress this April, Stoddard said this resolution informs the decision makers that communities like Manhattan do not want an extension of the moratorium.

"The real point is, everybody knows the Internet is growing, and over time, it's going to increase exponentially," she said.

Stoddard said a 1999 report by Shop.org, an online retail trade organization, said Internet sales constituted .5 percent of all 1998 retail sales and were expected to increase to .725 percent in 1999. Applying that figure to the city's 1999 sales, city staff estimated the $54,000 loss, she said.

Curt Wood, director of finance, said current sales tax totals 6.9 percent in Riley County and 5.9 percent in Pottawatomie County. The city's portion is 1.28 percent on the Riley County side and 1 percent in Pottawatomie County, with the rest as county and state taxes, he said.

That is money that can't just disappear from the city budget, when it pays for fire stations and water services, Peak said.

"The lost sales tax has to be made up from somewhere," she said. "It spills over and affects everybody. Everybody uses city services."

Senate resolution requests extra sections for courses

Student Senate unanimously approved a resolution Thursday that supports opening up more accounting and finance classes.

In the resolution, it states that Accounting 231 and Accounting 241 are the two classes most sought after at K-State.

The resolution also states much of the reason for the large number of students applying for the classes is both classes are required by majors and are prerequisites for other classes. Many times the classes allow more students in each class than what is designated by the departments.

The administration at K-State is working to open more classes while working within the accreditation guidelines.

In other business, Senate passed a bill for an allocation to the Asian-American Student Union.

Officer testifies he acted alone during sodomy attack

NEW YORK — Testifying for the first time about one of the most shocking police brutality cases in New York history, a former officer insisted Thursday that a colleague convicted of helping him sodomize Abner Louima with a broken broomstick wasn't even in the room at the time.

Former Officer Justin Volpe said that Officer Charles Schwarz, who faces a possible life sentence on his conviction for holding Louima down, had no part in the assault.

Volpe said another officer, Thomas Wiese, was the only person present in a police station bathroom during the attack.

"I never saw Schwarz in the bathroom at any time," Volpe repeatedly said in federal court in Brooklyn. "When I was in the bathroom, the only officer who assaulted Mr. Louima was myself."

Volpe, sentenced to 30 years after pleading guilty last year to the 1997 assault, was the first defense witness in the trial of Schwarz, 34, Wiese, 34, and Thomas Bruder, 37.

The three officers are charged with conspiring to conceal Schwarz's role in the attack on the Haitian immigrant.

Volpe said Wiese stood by the entire time, making no move to take part or intercede in the attack.

That conflicted sharply with Wiese's assertion, to detectives and Brooklyn district attorney investigators, that he had entered the bathroom during the attack and intervened by dragging a prostrate, bleeding Louima from a toilet stall by his legs.

Schwarz faces a possible life sentence after his 1999 conviction for violating Louima's civil rights by holding him down during the attack.

Volpe, at his own sentencing last December, said for the first time that Wiese, not Schwarz, was the second officer in the bathroom.

On Thursday, Volpe, 27, testified: "I want to do my time with a clear mind, with a clear conscience, and I can't live with myself and do my time in peace, knowing that another man is paying for the crime that I committed."

Fifth-grader kills himself, apologizes for poor grades

NEW YORK — A 10-year-old boy, apparently upset over his grades, hanged himself from his bunk bed with a belt, police said Thursday.

Anthony Richards was found Tuesday night by his mother after leaving a note apologizing for a bad report card he had brought home last week.

Police described the family as stable and loving.

The fifth-grader's mother, Marvell Archibald, said Anthony's teacher had picked on him because he was short. "Anthony told me, 'My teacher doesn't like me. Please take me out of her class,'" Archibald said.

United Federation of Teachers President Randi Weingarten defended the teacher, saying the 14-year veteran had a good relationship with Anthony. She said the boy was a good student.

Alcohol conviction. WACO, Texas — A man was sentenced to 60 years in prison after his ninth drunken-driving conviction — this one after he swerved in front of a Texas Alcoholic Beverage Commission agent.

Lynnwood Anthony Vrba, 56, was sentenced on Wednesday.

Vrba had been convicted of drunken driving eight times over the past three decades. This time he was charged as a habitual criminal, which means a tougher penalty.

He was arrested in 1998 after swerving into the oncoming lane in front of a Texas alcohol agent, Danny Pavlas. According to testimony, Vrba refused a police officer's request for a sobriety test, saying, "No, I don't need a test to tell you I'm drunk. I'm drunk. This ain't my first rodeo."

Vrba testified he is a disabled veteran and manic depressive who was taking three medications that might have enhanced the effects of two beers. He must serve at least 15 years before becoming eligible for parole.

Visiting students learn leadership, teamwork

By JOSS BRIGGS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas high school students dodged construction Thursday in the K-State Student Union to learn college survival tips.

About 500 high school students from across the state attended the 12th annual "Leadership 2000: Turning Vision into Action" leadership program.

"They reiterated the importance of working together," said Tyler McKenzie, senior at Labette County High School. "Probably the most important part is that everybody has to work together to get anything done."

This was the first time McKenzie attended the leadership program. He said the experience was enlightening.

"After sitting through the seminars and presentations, I realized how important leadership skills are," he said.

Students attended sessions ranging from unity to ethics to choosing a college career.

Jake Nelson, Minneapolis High School sophomore, attended a seminar on diversity. He said he learned the importance of acceptance.

"It was cool," Nelson said. "They talked about how people tend to take part in different cliques and how we need to just all get together."

Many of the high school students also changed their attitudes toward college.

Nelson said the experience showed him what college life will be like, and it's not exactly the picture portrayed on television.

"It's going to be kind of hard," Nelson said. "Parents aren't there with you, and it will be difficult getting up in the morning and going to class and doing everything on your own. I think it will be exciting but a little difficult at times, too."

Brad Thompson, senior at Labette County High School, agreed.

"The first time I came here, it changed my perception of college a great deal," he said. "There were many things I didn't see until I actually came here."

Thompson said he realized how important time management will be when he comes to college.

"As a high school student, you're still living at home, and your schedule is pretty much set," he said. "When you get up to college, you still have the responsibility, but the privileges and freedom increases, so you have to learn how to work them out."

The students also listened to speakers and networked from 8:30 a.m. to 3 p.m.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, filled in for the original keynote speaker, Keith Loy, who couldn't make the trip due to bad weather. Bosco challenged the students to take everything they learned during the day and make short-term goals to define what is right for them.

"Always be in a position to define your own success," he said.

Bosco gave his lecture at 2 p.m. in Forum Hall. He presented the students with a list that dealt with personal success. The list included advice ranging from developing a firm handshake to making every opportunity count.

Bosco said he still is revising the list, so he asked the students to snap their fingers when they agreed with something he said.

Melinda Cross, a student council sponsor and teacher at Russell High School, attended the speech.

"He made good points about things we can already recognize but brought them together in a clever manner," she said.

McKenzie said he learned to develop leadership skills through the program.

"We will now take this knowledge back to our high schools and improve the leadership there," McKenzie said.

McCurry, Heller announce campaign

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jesse McCurry and Kylo Heller said issues might be fleeting, but they have the leadership skills for the long haul.

The pair announced its candidacy to a group of supporters Thursday evening in Waters Hall.

"The winners of this election should be the ones who know where to find and define problems, who are creative enough to find practical solutions and most important are not afraid to ask for help," said McCurry, presidential candidate and senior in agricultural journalism.

McCurry said he just is asking students questions right now to find out what they want done.

"It is our belief that the best leaders are the best listeners who have the networking ability to find the right solutions," he said.

However, McCurry and running mate Heller warned students to be wary of candidates with big promises.

"We are two down-to-earth guys," Heller, junior in agronomy, said. "We are going to run a realistic campaign. We will not promise you the world if we can't give it to you."

The candidates said they will be more interested in getting things done than in building a legacy.

"This is about the ticket that will bring good ideas to the race," McCurry said. "But it is also an election where the winners should be level-headed and least concerned about getting credit when it is not deserved."

The two candidates billed themselves as Student Governing Association outsiders.

Heller has never been involved with SGA, and McCurry was involved only briefly.

However, they have been involved in other leadership opportunities on campus, in the greek system and in the College of Agriculture.

Robin Cates, campaign manager, said after long service in SGA, she was disillusioned with the leadership.

"We need someone who is listening to problems on campus and not sitting in their white palace waiting for students to come to us," she said.

Like other candidates, McCurry and Heller mentioned issues such as parking and advising as areas they saw as concerns.

"We here at the College of Agriculture have excellent advising," McCurry said.

"If we could only translate to the other colleges," he said.

McCurry said leadership will be the foundation of their platform.

"Leaders are humble, creative, able and sincere."

"Our platform, if you will, is only now beginning, but our leadership traits will never change," he said.

"We are going to run a realistic campaign. We will not promise you the world if we can't give it to you."

Proposed state seat-belt law will save lives

Preserving their own life is not reason enough to strap on a seat belt for some people.

It is to protect those people who have inspired state lawmakers to examine a bill that would permit law-enforcement officers to pull over drivers who are not wearing seat belts.

It is illegal not to wear your seat belt in Kansas, but fines for this violation are given only when a traffic stop is made for a different reason, such as speeding or failure to stop at an intersection. This law would change that by permitting stops based solely on a driver's lack of a seat belt.

The bill has regained momentum in the Kansas Legislature after the recent death of Chiefs' linebacker Derrick Thomas in an automobile accident. It is unfortunate that such a tragedy must occur before such an advantageous bill could be considered.

However, since it is now being looked at, the bill should be approved. The effect of the bill would be to penalize those who fail to buckle up. While this might seem to be a trivial reason to invoke a fine, what is a few dollars to the few people who forget compared to the lives it will save?

Many states already have such laws. Kansas has been slow to follow suit, but now is the time to take action.

The state's lawmakers need to look past the criticism of people who are too lazy to strap on a safety belt every time they climb in the car. It is those people, the ones who are criticizing the law, who will benefit the most in the end.

This law could end up saving their lives.

I would like to share my appreciation and support for both Scott Roney and Jeff Elliott and their stands for truth in their weekly columns. Both of these young men have shown much boldness and conviction in sharing their faith in Christ with this campus. I have been blessed and refreshed by the honesty and compassion these two have shared with their fellow students.
Keep up the good work, Roney and Elliott. God bless.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

After a semester of Brandi Hertig writing against Christianity, I think it's really nice to have Jeff Elliott defending Christianity.

Isn't it funny how when Acacia got caught hazing, they got kicked off campus for a couple years? When the Deltas got caught, we don't even know what they did, or what the punishment is.

Hey, Tom Asbury, go ask Jason Heinrich to fill your résumé, because he's a pro at it.

I really hate it when Elliott and the rest of the Collegian staff write their opinions on the opinion page.

When are we going to get some investigative journalism going on the price fixing going on at the Manhattan gas pumps? We're all really wondering what's going on.

"Who Wants to Marry a Multi-Millionaire?" epitomizes what is wrong with America today.

The Collegian is running low on journalistic integrity. Stop sensationalizing the so-called news. The latest on Littleton, Colo., is not front-page national news. Give it a rest, and leave that town alone, please.

Taryn, were you going to cite your sources, or were we just supposed to believe you?

Let's let Bill Snyder handle all coaching and recruiting for the basketball team next year.

I think Jeff Elliott's column on Fred Phelps and homosexuality was wonderful. I totally agree with everything he said.

I'd just like to say that Jeff Elliott's views of the Bible are totally taken out of context. It's really nice to know that I'm being judged just on my sexual orientation.

Am I the only one who thinks calculus promotes alcoholism?

Thin may be in, but fat is where it's at.

When is the next pageant to marry a multi-millionaire? Please sign me up.

I want to make my own show called, "Who Wants to Marry a Pre-Nursing Student Who is More than $20,000 in Debt?"

Why is the Fort Riley artillery practicing at one in the morning when I'm trying to sleep?

We'd like to thank the KSU fair-weather fans for not supporting their team.

broaden the BALLOT

Non-greeks need to combine efforts to elect SGA candidates

It's that time of year again when Mother Nature heralds the return of spring and all of her exiled creatures emerge from yet another long winter. Once again, the chorus of mating cardinals can be heard high above the din of everyday life, the pigeons can be seen perched high atop Seaton Hall and seeing another squirrel is just like breathing the air.

Unfortunately, just like everything else, we must accept the bad with the good, and, in this case, the bad is the politics and politicians who appear with every winter's thaw. These politicians already are peddling their wares and making promises they do not intend to keep well before the first flowers of spring ever begin to bloom. As a result, the mud slinging, name calling and ego wrestling often inherent with politics become as hard to avoid on campus as the bicycles and automobiles that nearly run down pedestrians every day.

Every spring, a small group of students — whether they are politicians or simply doing their civic duty — decide to run for student body president and vice president or student senator, or for positions on the College Councils, Board of Student Publications, Fine Arts Council or the Union Governing Board.

Every year, there are a dwindling number of voters who participate in the elections, and those who do usually are disappointed with the election results, with some even crying conspiracy. The disappointment and conspiracy theories arise out of a greek-dominated Senate that does not reflect the diversity of the student body properly.

Online voting will affect the way candidates have to campaign and will allow more students to vote this year, but the number of Senate seats controlled by the greeks likely will remain unchanged. As a result, a group that makes up little more than 20 percent of the student population will have control of more than 50 percent of the seats within Senate. This skewed representation is the direct result of en masse voting by greeks, not to mention that 75 percent of the candidates running for office usually have strong ties to the greek community. This often results in rumors that houses not only require their members to vote, but they also tell them who to vote for. Which is not entirely true.

The only thing the greek system is guilty of — aside from an occasional hazing incident — is being a mirror of how the party system actually works in national and state politics. The unity of the members within the greek system is comparable to the unity found within the Democratic or Republican parties, and as we all know these groups typically vote strictly along party lines. Besides, haven't you noticed that the U.S. Congress does not exactly reflect the population demographics of our pristine country?

Complicating matters for the greek community is a Senate that appears to be ignoring a concern of one of its non-greek constituents, Heath Schroeder. Whether or not Senate is choosing to ignore Schroeder's concern, it simply does not appear to be doing anything to correct the poor representation of students in Senate.

Appearance is everything, and Senate needs to look like it is trying to come up with solutions to circumvent this problem. This could be done by simply offering to create specialty seats, base seats according to living situations or by simply making the student more aware of the campaign and election process — online voting is a step in that general direction.

Even though Senate undoubtedly is over-represented by the greek population, some of the blame should fall on the shoulders of non-greeks as well. The non-greeks are quick to criticize but seem rather reluctant to offer any solutions to the problem. Instead, they enjoy turning the Collegian into a greek-bashing fest, when, in all actuality, they are the ones to blame for most of the current problems.

The unity found within the greek system — whether it is included in the dues or not — results in the formation of what could be called a greek political party. This is not found within the non-greek community and makes it nearly impossible for non-greek candidates to win a seat in Senate. How often have members of the so-called Independent Political Party won the majority in any given election? Just a hint, but it hasn't happened often. As a result, the non-greek community needs to come together and form one or two parties that will campaign each spring against the Greek Party. However, this alone will not ensure that everyone has an equal chance to become a student senator if the members of the greek community are the only ones voting. This would mean that, instead of the handful of non-greek students who usually vote, about 3,500 non-greek students would have to pull their thumbs out of their butts and vote. With voting occurring online this year, it is possible to vote without even getting dressed.

It's time for the non-greek community to realize it needs to stop complaining and crying conspiracy every time something doesn't go its way. It needs to stop blaming the greeks for things that are not within their control and put an end to the yearly dispute that always occurs between the greeks and the rest of campus. Instead, non-greeks need to take it in the face and deal with it like adults, which we are all supposed to be anyway.

Like I always have been told, "If you think you can do something better, then stop complaining and just do it yourself."

Everyone will have their chance to do something better by voting sometime on March 6, 7 or 8.

2 deaths in Littleton, Colo., cast shadow on Valentine's Day sentiments

It was supposed to be a day of love.

A day of romance filled with roses, chocolates and balloons. But on this day Cupid didn't shoot arrows. Red, the supposed color of love, was spilled. Spilled by the hands of someone who had no true understanding of love.

Two hearts stopped beating; far too many lay broken. The day of love, candy and teddy bears, became a day of hatred.

Early Monday morning, two Columbine High students were found murdered. Their bodies were found after a shooting at a sandwich shop near the school.

Nicholas Kunselman, 15, and Stephanie Hart, 16, are now just part of the many heartbreaking stories that have occurred in Littleton, Colo.

On April 20, teenagers Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold were behind the guns of the worst school massacre in the history of the United States. Because of Harris and Klebold, 12 students and one teacher died. The two then committed suicide. They didn't just take themselves down; they selfishly took innocent people down with them.

Reading stuff like this can make your chest feel like it's being catapulted to your stomach.

It can make your heart feel like it has a severe case of heartburn, because it hurts so badly. If you are eating when you hear the news, it can make you push away your food and no longer have an appetite.

This information can make your eyes fill with tears and your heart reach out to the families and friends, to the victims and even to the entire town.

All too often, if it doesn't directly effect someone, then the tragedy gets pushed to the back of the mind. When questioned, or mentioned, average people will remember where they heard the news.

Yet it usually isn't in their daily thoughts if it didn't completely hit home with them.

Questions always arise in situations like this. Where are the answers to help prevent this from happening? Who is to blame for this occurrence? Is it the fault of those pulling the trigger? Or did something happen in their lives that caused them to act like this? Can we use the parents as a scapegoat? Should we put the blame on society, on teachers, on the news media or on TV shows in general?

Granted, there are factors that can contribute to someone having difficulties in their lives. However, the bottom line is whoever pulled the trigger, whoever loaded the gun and fired it with the intent to kill someone else, are the people to blame.

If their parents didn't spend enough time with them it can result in a life filled with challenges.

If they read stories in the press that glorified this hatred, they also should have read about the people whose lives would never be the same because of these violent acts.

Nothing that happened in a murder should justify killing someone else. They might have factors that contributed to their lives being uneasy, but that does not grant the right to cause someone else harm.

Their own misfortunes do not grant them the power to make it so that the families of Kunselman and Hart can never see their children again.

I am sick of the excuses that come with acts like this. Whenever something tragic happens, there always has to be a reason behind it. The reasons are usually part of the scapegoat process. Excuses are made such as not fitting in with other kids at school or not getting enough attention.

Where are the excuses for the families of the victims? The excuses that their children must have been in the wrong place at the wrong time or that the world is going crazy can't bring their loved ones back. This reasoning will not justify what they're going through.

The bottom line is that the blame lies with the murderers. It was they, not their previous misfortunes, who pulled the trigger.

Refugees, human rights groups say Russians torture Chechens

By ANDREW KRAMER
The Associated Press

MALGOBEK, Russia — Chechens trying to leave their war-ravaged republic are being tortured in Russian detention camps and subjected to severe beatings, rapes and other brutality, refugees and human rights groups say.

The allegations come on the heels of other complaints of human rights abuses in the Russian offensive in Chechnya, including reports of summary executions of civilians in Grozny, the Chechen capital.

Russian officials deny the allegations, but Chechens who have fled into neighboring republics tell similar, grisly accounts of their detention in camps that Russia says it set up to filter out rebels who are trying to escape disguised as civilians.

A 21-year-old Chechen, lying in pain in a bed in Malgobek in neighboring North Ossetia, said his ordeal began Jan. 22 when police dragged him off a bus of refugees and took him to a camp in the Chechen village of Chernokozovo.

The man, who asked that he be identified only by his first name, Ruslan, said he was forced to run a gauntlet of masked policemen swinging truncheons, had his clothes torn off and was forced to stand naked in a cold storage room.

"I asked what they were detaining me for, but they didn't answer," he said. He was released only after his mother paid a bribe to the camp directors, he said.

At least three such camps are operating, according to Peter Bouckaert, a researcher for the Human Rights Watch group in the region.

"Russia appears to have declared any Chechen male to be a suspected rebel, subject to arbitrary arrest and brutal treatment," he said.

The allegations were echoed by the World Organization Against Torture, which issued a statement in Geneva on Thursday saying, "We cannot ignore that the filtration camps are indeed concentration camps where Russian soldiers are committing the worst atrocities, in all impunity, against their prisoners."

In Washington, D.C., State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said Thursday that "Russia has a clear obligation to investigate the numerous credible reports of civilian killings and alleged misconduct by its soldiers promptly."

Sergei Yastrzhembsky, who is acting President Vladimir Putin's aide for Chechnya information, on Thursday reiterated denials of torture at Chernokozovo.

The allegations are "the No. 1 topic in the information war the Western mass media have unleashed," he said on Russia's ORT television. "Routine work like in any other detention center is going on there."

He said that European Union observers would be allowed into the camp to see the situation for themselves, but gave no date of a possible visit. The Council of Europe's human rights commissioner, Alvaro Gil-Robles, is due to arrive in Moscow on Thursday, but his office could give no details of the trip.

Ruslan, the refugee, told of a routine of torment, in which detainees often were beaten in a hallway in the early morning, their cries awakening others in their cells.

Ruslan said guards told him "don't look me in the eyes, you black face," and then one hit him in the spine with a hammer. He says he has not been able to stand erect since then.

An investigator accused him of fighting on the side of the Islamic rebel groups that have battled Russian soldiers during the six-month war and demanded names and addresses of rebels, Ruslan said.

"Those who signed confessions, or said they could identify other men who were fighters, did not come back to the cells," according to another refugee who said he also had been at Chernokozovo.

The refugee, Eli, said a masked policeman once opened a peephole to the cell and said, "Who wants a smoke?"

When a prisoner approached the hole, the guard sprayed tear gas into the cell and those inside reeled and were racked by coughs for minutes, Eli said.

Eli said a man from their cell was called out and he heard guards rape him. Then a guard said he should answer to a woman's name, Fatima. Other detainees described similar acts.

After this event, when guards rapped on the cell door with a truncheon, the detainees were to call out the number of people in the cell as "15 men and one woman," Eli said.

Yastrzhembsky said Thursday there are 16 women among the 235 people held in Chernokozovo. But he rejected a report by the French newspaper Le Monde that said there were children in the camp.

ness is local competitors.

Steve Levin, owner of Varney's Book Store, said the whole issue boils down to a level playing field for all businesses.

Levin said his store's used books still can beat Internet vendors like Amazon.com, VarsityBooks.com and Bigwords.com in the textbook business, but the competitors have the backing to take losses and still grow.

Varney's Book Store also sells books online, but since it has a "brick and mortar" presence in the area, the business still is subject to sales tax, Levin said. Without tax rules that apply to everyone, Levin said stores like Varney's Book Store could evolve into merchandise showrooms.

"My fear is people will look at what we've got and go online to buy it," he said.

DANCE

will be from 5 p.m. to 5 a.m., and Wildman said the event will feature local bands, a disc jockey and dance instructors who will teach different types of dances throughout the evening. Prizes will be awarded from best dancing to who lasts the longest during the event.

A date and place for the dance-a-thon has not yet been set.

Wildman said the idea came from a speech he and Bosco heard from a presenter from the University of Iowa. He also said other universities across the country have done similar fund-raisers.

The event at Pennsylvania State University raises almost $2.5 million annually.

"We would like to turn this into an annual event with the proceeds going to building a house each spring," Wildman said. "We are kind of in the dark now to how much money we will make, but we think we will have a lot of support for the project."

Bosco said the goal is to raise $25,000 at the dance-a-thon. The event, which is open to students, faculty and the community, costs $100 to participate, but Bosco said there are several ways to raise the entry fee. An informational meeting will be at 8 p.m. Feb. 27 in the Union Little Theatre.

"If everyone were to get $20 from five family members, you have $100," Bosco said. "We want to encourage people to participate and give them ideas of how to raise the money in the process."

Bosco said a percentage of the proceeds from the dance-a-thon will be donated to K-State's Habitat for Humanity chapter. This will go toward the fund-raising efforts for its house in April.

In return, Bosco said Habitat for Humanity will help The House that K-State Built committee to raise money for its house.

"Our end goal is the same — to build a house," Bosco said. "We are helping each other and in this way, we are continually raising money for Habitat for Humanity and giving them more opportunities to build a house each spring."

Wildman said the project allows everyone on campus to become involved and to elevate the divisions between campus groups. He said it allows people to become involved in one common goal.

"This allows everyone to leave their mark on the community and leave a lasting impression," Wildman said. "This is a way to claim a service project as campus-wide and the end result benefiting the community."

KU matchup true test of Cats' playing ability

The K-State women's basketball team will face a significant test when it plays rival Kansas at 3 p.m. Saturday in Allen Fieldhouse.

K-State (12-13, 5-7) has won several games on the road and defeated Iowa State, a conference leader, at home. Now, the Cats must face a talented, confident team on its home court.

This matchup could determine how far K-State has progressed this season and how far they have to go, K-State head coach Deb Patterson said.

"It remains to be seen if we can match up with KU, if we can play with that caliber of opponent basket for basket," Patterson said.

The Jayhawks (18-6, 9-3) are tied for second in the Big 12 and are coming off a momentum-building 79-71 win at Iowa State. As a result, the Cats will have to play their best game of the year to even keep the game close, let alone win, Patterson said.

"I think it's presumptuous to assume that we can go in there as the No. 8 team in the conference, after KU knocked off Iowa State on the road in front of 13,000 screaming fans, and win," Patterson said.

While a win is important, continued improvement is the Cats' goal, Patterson said.

"We want to walk off the court knowing we played good basketball," Patterson said.

To gain that knowledge, K-State must figure out how to match up with a Kansas lineup that has scoring potential from all five positions. Four Kansas players average more than 11 points, led by senior forward Lynn Pride, who averages 17.5 points per game.

Pride especially has gained the respect of the K-State squad and of the entire country, Patterson said.

"Lynn Pride will be a first-round WNBA draft pick and probably will be a first-five pick," Patterson said. "Our only hope is that we can maximize our opportunities to defend her and minimize the opportunities she might get to make spectacular plays one-on-one."

In order to minimize Pride and the rest of the Jayhawks' offensive chances, K-State most likely will be forced into a zone, Patterson said.

Kansas also uses its talent effectively on the defensive end of the court, applying a fierce full-court pressure that disrupts opponents' offensive flow. Consequentially, K-State is focusing its offensive game plan around breaking the press instead of focusing on the post or perimeter games.

"We will have to work hard to get in our offense," Patterson said.

"Handling that excellent, physical full-court pressure is the key to the game. After that, we'll take whatever opportunities are available."

Wildcats go to net to battle Hurricane

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

The 50th-ranked K-State tennis team must bear down for a challenge after a relatively easy three-week stretch that consisted of two 9-0 wins and a bye week when it takes on No. 59 Tulsa at Ahearn Field House on Saturday.

Though the 3-2 Hurricane sport an unremarkable won-lost record, Wildcat coach Steve Bietau said that as with his own 3-2 squad, there is more to Tulsa than their record might indicate.

"I think they're pretty comparable to us, in that they've played against strong competition and have a decent record," he said. "Unless you know who they've played, the records don't tell you much."

The Hurricane's showing against K-State during regional matches in November is telling, however. There, Tulsa's No. 6 singles player, Jennifer DeSpain, nearly knocked off junior Anna Pampoulova, K-State's No. 3 player, and the Hurricane's No. 1 doubles tandem of Monica Poveda and Jana Sedivac upended K-State's top duo of Pampoulova and sophomore Alena Jecminkova.

Bietau said he was impressed with Tulsa's top-to-bottom depth, which he said was a switch from the Hurricane's usual star-dominated teams.

"This may be Tulsa's best team," he said. "This may be their deepest team. They don't have one outstanding player, but they have a number of solid ones. Their top four are all pretty strong, and they don't drop a lot below that."

If there is a weakness K-State might be able to exploit, it is the Hurricane's 1-5 and 1-4 records, respectively, in No. 1 and No. 2 singles. Those two slots are precisely where K-State's singles strength lies. At No. 1, freshman Petra Sedlmajerova remains undefeated in her matches this season, and Jecminkova has posted a 2-1 record in the second slot.

Having had a week off to hone their skills and work on conditioning, Bietau said the Cats need to shake off their rust and transfer those lessons to game action this weekend to come away with a win.

"The real test will be when we get into the matches," Bietau said. "We just need to keep moving ahead, trying to play smarter, and to improve in all aspects. There's not just one thing that's going to decide this match."

Freshman Missouri player displays promising actions both on, off court

Kareem Rush couldn't have been blessed with a better basketball name. Think about it. The classic first name made famous by Kareem Abdul-Jabbar and a last name that exemplifies the euphoric sensation of witnessing a classic on the hardwood. Together, the two create a title that basketball fans can take to quickly and market-ing executives salivate over.

Good thing he has the game to back it up.

Only a freshman, Missouri's seventh Mr. Show-Me Basketball (The award given to the state's top high school player) has lived up to his billing as a well-rounded small forward with a shooter's smooth touch. In his six games of Big 12 Conference play, Rush has averaged a team-best 14.2 points per game. That includes a career-high 31 points in Mizzou's 86-76 victory at Texas Tech on Tuesday night.

Saturday, Rush and the rest of the Tigers will be on display at Bramlage Coliseum, giving K-State fans a first chance to place the 6-foot-6-inch standout under the microscope and test his resolve in a hostile environment.

It won't be anything new to Rush, however. His entire first year at Mizzou has been the epitome of survival.

The crown jewel of first-year Missouri head coach Quin Snyder's recruiting class, Rush started his Division I career strongly, averaging 10.9 points during the first nine games of the season. But the hometown hero's career hit a snag. Namely, an NCAA investigation, every D-I player's biggest fear.

The investigation resulted in a nine-game suspension due to Rush's alleged use of $1,800 of expenses in high school, an NCAA violation. The suspension halted a promising start for Rush, and it cast a dark shadow over Snyder's young program despite Missouri's lack of involvement in the matter. Suddenly, the unassuming 19-year-old with the golden name and sweet jump shot was pulled into the grown-up world of harsh reality.

Rush didn't play the blame game, though. Unlike so many athletes today who try to pawn their problems off on any scapegoat or excuse within 50 feet, Rush accepted his punishment. He had an all-too-constant reminder that things could have been worse. (His brother JaRon, a sophomore at UCLA, was suspended for an entire season due to more severe NCAA violations.)

When the shackles of suspension finally were removed Jan. 29, Rush responded with a drive to succeed, despite adversity. Being away from the game for more than a month didn't stop Rush from leading the Tigers with 16 points in a 93-62 victory against Texas A&M.

The numbers only have gotten better for Rush since — 21 points at Nebraska on Feb. 5, shooting better than 60 percent from the field since he served his suspension — not the typical production from a freshman, especially one who's played less than two-thirds of the Tigers' schedule this season. What Rush does share with the multitude of first-year players is the ability to get better, a scary thought for the rest of the Big 12.

Rush has provided Snyder with another valuable weapon to mix in with young stars Keyon Dooling, Clarence Gilbert and T.J. Soyoye and veterans like Johnnie Parker and Jeff Hafer. The result has been a 15-8 start and included an early run for the Big 12 title.

Although a recent two-game skid dropped the Tigers to 8-3 in conference play and probably out of the title chase, an NCAA bid many thought impossible following the retirement of Norm Stewart still is a reality.

K-State would like nothing more than to ruin Mizzou's postseason dreams. That, as well as ending a 10-game losing streak, would be one of the few things the Wildcats can still hope to accomplish in an otherwise disheartening year. The possibility of an upset hinges on neutralizing the Tigers' hot hand.

That leaves Rush in the cross hairs once again.

Life on the road in the Big 12 is never smooth, especially for a freshman. But don't expect Rush to suddenly crack under the pressure. He's proven this season that life is much easier to deal with on the court than off of it.

Cats ready to face Tigers in Bramlage

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Despite the K-State men's basketball team's plunge into the depths of the Big 12 Conference, Saturday's game against the Missouri Tigers at Bramlage Coliseum might leave some hope for the Wildcats, who are stuck in a 10-game losing streak.

Traditionally, the Cats (8-14, 1-10) have fared well at home, where they have won three of the past four meetings against the Tigers (14-8, 7-3), including K-State's 111-56 triumph in 1998.

Compared to the Jan. 15 meeting between the two schools, K-State has the look of a different squad. In the earlier meeting this season, a game in which K-State was defeated 73-56, the Cats were without senior forward/guard Josh Reid and sophomore forward Travis Reynolds — both of whom have rejoined the lineup.

"We have a lot more personnel than the last time we played Missouri," assistant coach Mark Fox said. "Since we now have Reid and Reynolds back, I think we can put pressure on them in rebounding."

"We missed them in the first meeting. Rebounding was the key element to their win."

Rebounding did prove to be a huge difference. The K-State lineup was outrebounded 41-28, including 16-6 on the offensive boards.

Containing Missouri's three-point threats also could prove to be the key to the game, considering the Tigers' were nine of 27 from beyond the arc, including Clarence Gilbert, who was five of nine himself.

For the game, Gilbert led the Tigers in scoring with 25 points. He was just one of four Tigers to score in double figures.

"Gilbert had a three-week period there when he was killing everybody," Fox said. "We need to just try to contain him, so he doesn't have another 25 point night against us."

Though K-State is entrenched in its longest losing streak since the 1996-97 season and coming off one of its most embarrassing losses in school history last week to Kansas, Fox said one could never tell by watching practices.

"You wouldn't guess our record by watching our practices," Fox said. "Our biggest problem that we need to carry over into our games is our consistency on the defensive end."

"We've lost some games because of poor defense or turnovers. Consistency would be good for us. We tend to score in bunches and then go on a cold spell. But with Josh and Travis back, the flow has been a lot better."

KELLY GLASSCOCK/COLLEGEIAN

Galen Morrison drives into the lane against the Colorado Buffaloes in a game early this year at Bramlage Coliseum. K-State is host to Missouri this Saturday at 12:45 p.m.

The Cats will be trying to avoid an 11-game slide, something that hasn't happened since 1945. They are paced by senior guard Cortez Groves, who averages 15.5 points per game, and senior forward Tony Kitt, who posts 12.9 points per contest as well as 9.3 rebounds a game.

Kitt and Groves led the Cats in scoring the first time around with 21 and 14 points, respectively.

K-State will need a better effort in three-point shooting Saturday than that of the first meeting, when it was three of 16. In fact, junior point guard Galen Morrison, who leads the team in threes, missed all five attempts and was two of 10 overall for four points.

Fox said, once again with the return of Reid to the lineup, K-State will have another strong shooter on the floor.

"We've been pretty solid in three-point shooting," Fox said. "Having Reid back gives us more balance there. Last time we didn't have three-point shooter to insert into the lineup, so we weren't as effective."

Tipoff is scheduled for 12:45 p.m.

A Bridal Shop Celebrations of the Heart Story

Story by Danedri Thompson

Shop's owner celebrates realization of her dream

Laura Rothlisberger's dream will have its grand opening this weekend.

Her dream has been a reality since Celebrations of the Heart, a bridal store she owns, opened its doors on Jan. 7. The store's grand opening will be from 1 to 5 p.m. Sunday.

When Rothlisberger was in high school, her mom ran a bridal store in Ottawa, Kan. It was something Rothlisberger knew she wanted to do herself.

She said she has thought about opening a store in Manhattan for 20 years.

"I've just been watching the market here for about 20 years. I've seen them come, and I've seen them go," she said. "As far as having just a bridal shop, there hasn't been one for several years, and I've wanted to have a business of my own for quite some time."

She said she didn't know if she has been doing things right with her store, but she's been happy with the results so far.

"So far, we've been very pleased," she said.

Although the shop is primarily a bridal shop, she said part of her strategy for success is specializing in retail for life stages. The store carries formal wear, bridal wear and maternity wear.

"When I decided to go into the bridal business, I thought, 'how can I get people into my store before they need a wedding gown?'" she said. "And I thought formal wear to target the college and high school age when they're going to prom and formal functions."

She said she also wanted to get people into the store after their weddings.

"What's the next stage of life? Well, people start families," she said. "I have three children of my own, and I know from being pregnant around this town, there's a limited supply of maternity clothes."

Another one of Rothlisberger's strategies is networking with others who serve brides and grooms. The work of several photographers is part of the store's decoration, and she has a table with Mary Kay Cosmetics pamphlets for brides wondering where to get makeup for the big day.

Grooms can find a tuxedo at the store, too, Rothlisberger said. The store has wholesale agreements with Randall's Formalwear tuxedo shop and another tuxedo shop in Wichita.

Jenny Shultz, sophomore in elementary education, works at Celebrations of the Heart. She said the store offers connections with a variety of services.

The fifth annual Little Apple Bridal Fair will open its doors at 1 p.m. this Sunday at the Manhattan Holiday Inn.

A fashion show, set to begin shortly after 3 p.m., will feature wedding gowns, bridesmaid and flower girl dresses, as well as tuxedos. Tuxedos will be presented by Swan's Bridal and Tuxedos in Topeka. Lingerie and swimsuits from Patricia's Undercover also will be shown.

Modeling tuxedos from Swan's Tux Shop in Manhattan will be members of K-State's track and field team and football team.

The fashion show will feature gowns in many different styles and price ranges, said Melinda Mann of Swan's Bridal and Tuxedos.

"We will have a huge variety. Pretty much anything you can dream up, you can find," Mann said. "Good value for your money."

According to Terry Walker, owner of Confetti's Party Shop and the Little Apple Bridal Fair, more than 30 of the area's wedding vendors will be on hand to lend expert advice to local brides.

"This bridal fair will give brides a better knowledge of what services are offered in the Manhattan area and surrounding towns," Walker said. "We will have people here from Manhattan, Junction City and Topeka."

Vendors representing many aspects of wedding planning will be in attendance, Walker said.

"We will have florists, carriages, invitations, accessories, photographers, reception halls, videographers and disc jockeys, as well as many others," he said.

The bridal fair is a good way for prospective brides to find sources of wedding information

Early registry increases time to make decisions

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Early birds get the gifts.

Rebekah Thornton, senior in speech communications, said when she and her fiancé decided to register for their wedding, they did it early to give plenty of time to make decisions.

"We first went to look around to see what we wanted," Thornton said. "We wanted to do it early, because it gave people more time to look and decide what they wanted to give us as gifts."

Thornton, who will be married on July 15, said they have registered at J.C. Penney Co. Inc., but also will register at Wal-Mart and Target. She said things such as flatware, towels, sheets and household appliances were things they put on their registry.

"We went to look at things we wanted before we actually registered for anything," Thornton said. "Since we have done it early, we still have plenty of time to go back and add things if we want to."

Betty Campbell, owner of Campbell's China & Gifts, said couples should register six months before the wedding to give the bride plenty of time between various wedding plans. She said as the wedding approaches, brides tend to get busy and run out of time to devote to registering.

"It takes time to decide what you want to register for, so you can't just walk in and do it in one day," Campbell said. "In order to give the bride plenty of time, you should do it well before the wedding and spend a week or two to come to a decision."

Campbell said her store specializes in fine china in both informal and formal settings, crystal, flatware

"We also have a lot of connections to things like photographers and cake decorators," Shultz said. "That's really helpful for a lot of students, because they aren't from Manhattan and don't know where to find all these things."

One shopper, Jane Duerksen, visited the store from Abilene, Kan. She said her daughter is a student at K-State and is planning a wedding. The opening of the store made it more convenient for her to find things for her daughter's wedding, she said. In the past she has had to travel to Salina, Kan., and Paola, Kan., to look for wedding dresses for her daughters.

"We have nothing in Abilene," Duerksen said.

Shultz said helping brides try on wedding gowns is her favorite part of working at the store.

"It's always exciting when a bride puts on a dress and falls in love immediately," she said.

said Mark Kuecker, owner of the local Complete Music franchise.

"The thing that Little Apple Bridal Fair has to offer is more vendors. Brides can compare services first hand," Kuecker said. "They can expect excited, happy, friendly vendors who sincerely want to help. We not only want to sell our businesses but we want to help brides. That's the most important thing. We look forward to meeting them and visiting with them."

and linens for the tabletop. She said stoneware has become popular among couples because of the designs and patterns available.

"I think couples like the look and durability of stoneware," Campbell said. "It is durable as any dinnerware can be, and for young couples looking at a table setting, there are some new designs and color schemes that keep up with current trends."

Campbell said registering can take as much time as the couple wants, depending on how prepared they are to make decisions.

"I think it is good for the bride to look around and see what is available," Campbell said. "She needs to get some ideas and look several times before coming to an agreement of what the couple wants."

Veronica Mangiaracino, assistant manager of the Manhattan Wal-Mart, said couples should plan on registering before any bridal showers. She said the registering process is simple; couples can pick up a form at the store and write down everything they want. The registry forms are kept on file for up to a month after the wedding.

She also said if a couple needs the registry sent to another store, Wal-Mart can fax it to any store.

"Couples should make sure and ask questions if there is anything they need or don't understand,"

"The most important thing is to find out their likes and dislikes," Kuecker said. "We want to know what they want. We will help them plan if they want. My hope is that when they leave the show, they will have at least one idea that they can work with. If everyone goes home with at least one idea, then the fair was successful."

After running an accomplished photography studio in Oregon, Pete Garfinkel, owner of ShadowSmith Photography, moved to Manhattan.

This will be his first year to participate in the Little Apple Bridal Fair.

"I would like to introduce myself to the community and see if I can provide brides with some ideas," he said. "I would like to give them tips on making their day a day to celebrate."

Garfinkel said he wants brides and grooms to be able to enjoy their days.

"Weddings are fun. It's always about celebration," he said. "It's a day to enjoy."

"We change our bulbs every 400 hours."

Jazz band frequents Auntie Mae's

By SHANNON DELMEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEAN

Wasted Potential, a jazz band made up of K-State students and faculty, will play at 10:30 tonight at Auntie Mae's Parlor.

Wasted Potential has played at Auntie Mae's every Friday night since it was formed five years ago. For the members of the band, the performance is nothing to be nervous about.

The band's look and music changes from week to week, said Jeff Denney, manager of Auntie Mae's Parlor. He said this helps attract different crowds to each performance.

"They always have different people coming and sitting in with them," Denney said.

Deon Hairston, the band's drummer, said the music can be improvisational.

"This is music where right on the spot you will be ready to play the song. We can't rehearse and say this is how it's going to be. It's not structured that way," he said. "It's more of a true sensation of music. You get it as we get it. Its not rehearsed music — it's music straight off our minds."

Tonight the band will be without its leader, Dennis Wilson, assistant dean of arts and sciences. Wilson is also a member of the Carnegie Hall jazz band, and must make appearances with Carnegie whenever it calls.

Hairston said this is not a problem, as Wilson has been a good leader to the group.

"Jazz is jazz," he said. "We're going to play it regardless. He taught us well. We have a good teacher, so we can carry it by ourselves."

The band plays music from several different artists, including Miles Davis and Duke Ellington, but they also play compositions written by Wilson's students.

Chris Staben, piano player, said Wasted Potential is a completely different genre of music than what usually is playing at Auntie Mae's.

"A lot of the bands that play down there are for a younger crowd. It's a different style of music. They're more rock 'n' roll based or rock-folk, whereas Wasted Potential is jazz," Staben said. "They're focused on keeping the tradition of jazz going in Manhattan."

The band has gathered a regular audience. The members said they see familiar faces in the audience on Fridays.

Hairston said Wilson gives the band a real East Coast feel.

"What he does in New York, he's coming down here to Manhattan and doing the same thing," he said.

The only real jazz available in Manhattan is the jazz provided by Wasted Potential, Hairston said.

"There is one jazz band that I know of in Manhattan, Kansas, and that's it," he said. "Wasted Potential is the only jazz gig that I know. If you want to come hear real jazz, that would be the place to go."

Staben said Wasted Potential is a benefit to Manhattan.

"It's good to be able to go to a place in Manhattan and hear jazz," he said. "Auntie Mae's is the only place you can go and find jazz on a regular basis. I think it's good that there is a band in Manhattan to play it, so people can go and hear jazz, if that's what they like to hear."

Hairston said the band enjoys playing every Friday night.

"It's intense live jazz," he said. "We're having fun doing it. It's a live thing, but it's just basically what anybody feels like playing — what you're in the mood for right then."

'Camelot' brings medieval times to Manhattan

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEAN

It is a musical of love, desire and betrayal set during the medieval period. "Camelot," a story that has been told on stage and on screen, will be performed at 7 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

Thom Jackson, marketing development officer for McCain, said the Troika company will be performing the show. Troika producers are the same individuals who brought the music of Andrew Lloyd Weber to McCain earlier this month.

Jennifer Howey, director of marketing for Troika, said the company is based in Maryland, but the auditions were in New York. The tour for "Camelot" opened last fall.

Jackson said the audience can expect to hear songs they are familiar with, including "If Ever I Should Leave You."

"Audience members should expect one thing for certain," he said. "They should expect to be very well entertained."

Jackson said it is a good opportunity for the audience to experience a show of this caliber. He said high-quality performances such as in "Camelot" are rare in this area.

Howey said the audience will enjoy this well-known performance.

"Camelot is just such a love story. It's a classic — everyone knows the story of King Arthur," she said. "It's just magical."

"Camelot" was written in the 1960s and was performed more than 60,000 times on Broadway. It has been touring since that time. Jackson said the show is based on "The Once and Future King" by T.H. White. The story of "Camelot" also was retold in the recent movie, "The First Knight."

Jackson said the story is about a vision King Arthur had of a golden city.

"In this city, the people were just and honest," he said. "Everyone was equal and had to obey the law, even the king."

Things change when Guenevere, King Arthur's wife, and Sir Lancelot, the head of the Knights of the Round Table, fall in love. Their love brings them to an affair, which was illegal.

"It brings the whole Camelot to its knees," Jackson said. "Guenevere is supposed to be executed. And if people want to find out the rest of the story, they need to come and watch the performance."

Playing King Arthur is Craig Davenport, Guenevere is played by Cassandra McConnell, and Sir Lancelot is performed by Albert Parker.

Steve Shields, CEO for Meadowlark Hills, a corporate sponsor of "Camelot," said they are pleased to help bring "Camelot" to Manhattan.

"We really like to see the arts promoted in Manhattan," Shields said. "We wanted to do our share to make that be the case."

Students' requests result in 'Fight Club' screening at Union

By SARAH McCAFFREY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEAN

Box office hits at cheap prices.

Union Program Council offers students a chance to see recent movies without paying theater rates. Tonight and Saturday, UPC will feature "Fight Club" starring Brad Pitt and Edward Norton. The show will play at 7 and 9:45 each night. Admission is $1.75.

"The first rule of 'Fight Club' is never to talk about 'Fight Club,'" Paul Donovan, UPC program adviser, said.

The movie revolves around Norton's character, the narrator. Bored with the routines of day-to-day life, he searches for an outlet to his pent-up frustrations.

Struggling to cope with his pain, the narrator begins to attend 12-step meetings. His rationale in attending the meetings comes from the idea that he can take comfort from others' suffering.

The narrator has another opportunity to escape the dreary of his boring existence when he meets Tyler Durden, played by Pitt. Durden and the narrator make an emotional connection of sorts. As the movie continues, their paths become even more intertwined.

Durden gives the narrator an opportunity to get involved in Fight Club. The group is an underground society of men who beat each other up in hope of finding enlightenment and an escape from their dull existences.

The movie is an action movie as well as a psychological thriller. Jessica Bolton, freshman in business, said.

"It was a mind-bender," she said.

Michael Rottinghaus, Feature Films Committee Chairman and senior in biology, said UPC decided to bring "Fight Club" to K-State because it was a box office success.

"We try to choose movies that do well in theaters," he said. "We thought it would do good business here."

Another reason the film was chosen was word-of-mouth from students.

"We've had a lot of people say they've seen it once, and they want to come back and see it again," Donovan said. "There are also a lot of people that haven't seen it that want to see it."

Graves proposes possible tax increase

By JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Gov. Bill Graves isn't ruling out a tax increase to help pay for education if he and legislators decide to rewrite the law that distributes money to school districts.

Graves has created a 100-member task force to review important issues facing the state, and one of its subcommittees is supposed to review the state's 1992 school finance law.

Some legislators see the law as deeply flawed in how it distributes more than $1.8 billion in state aid to Kansas' 304 school districts. Medium-sized districts complain the formula unfairly deprives them of an adequate share of money.

Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, has suggested that a future tax increase is inevitable to meet the needs of public elementary, junior high and high schools.

He repeated that assertion Thursday in remarks during The Associated Press Day at the Legislature program.

Asked later about Bond's comments, Graves noted that when legislators enacted the school finance law eight years ago, they increased taxes.

Legislators raised sales and income taxes to offset a decrease in school property taxes, but they raised extra money for education at the same time.

Graves said that if his task force recommends rewriting the school finance law and legislators concur, "I would not expect it to save us any money. I would expect that it's going to cost us some additional dollars."

He added: "If we reach a consensus on a formula that we think serves our state well and it has a price tag above and beyond what we can afford, I would not rule out a discussion about a tax increase to pay for that. We shouldn't rule that out if we want to be fair and let the process really work."

Bond previously suggested that the state's budget problems resulted from legislators cutting taxes too much in recent years. He said the state needs to undo some of those cuts.

He later acknowledged most legislators won't vote for a tax increase this year because it is an election year.

Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, said he doesn't see any desire to increase taxes among his colleagues. However, he acknowledged he would be willing to support one for education if he thinks it is necessary.

Under the 1992 law, the state sets the budgets of public schools at $3,770 per student, then adjusts each district's enrollment to account for poor students, students who use the bus and other factors.

213 hopefuls file for office for 2000-01

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Numbers are up for students filing for Student Governing Association positions with 213 students filing, 15 more than last year.

Elections Chair Travis Morgan said he is excited by the high number of students running this year. Morgan said there are nine presidential tickets.

"I was definitely surprised by the nine presidential tickets," he said. "That's going to be a fun ordeal."

One of Morgan's explanations for the high numbers is Student Senate's doing a good job this year and addressing some hot topics.

"That always gets more interest in running for office," he said. "I also think just word of mouth would be the best explanation."

Jeff Meder, Election Committee member, said he was surprised by the high numbers, which will make some things a little tougher for the committee.

"I think we'll have to keep a bigger watch on campaign violations," he said. "We'll see how it goes."

Morgan said official numbers of how many people are running for each position will not be available until this afternoon. Candidates' grades and hours have to be checked to make sure they meet the requirements.

A candidate must have completed a minimum of 12 semester hours and be enrolled in 12 semester hours with a cumulative grade point average of 2.0. Union Governing Board candidates must have a 2.5 GPA, and graduate students must have a 3.0 GPA.

Morgan said numbers also might decrease if any candidates miss one of the three mandatory informational meetings on today, Tuesday or Wednesday.

"They have to attend one of the mandatory informational meetings, or they get kicked off the ballot," he said. "But they can still run a write-in campaign."

Jury convicts 3 for 1999 homicide of ESU student

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

EMPORIA, Kan. — Three men were convicted Friday of manslaughter in the beating death of an Emporia State football player.

A jury acquitted Andrew Lloyd, 21; Kelly Maxfield, 22; and Rex Pendley, 23, of unintentional second-degree murder in the death of Brian Wagner, but found them guilty of involuntary manslaughter.

Wagner, 19, of St.

Paul in southeast Kansas, was beaten in an early morning brawl on April 21, 1999, involving the three men and at least two others in a downtown Emporia parking lot. Wagner died six days later of severe head injuries suffered in the fight.

A sentencing date has been set for April 24.

The three could be placed on probation or sentenced to a minimum of 2 1/2 years in prison, depending on their criminal histories.

Twila Wagner, Brian Wagner's mother, said following the verdict Friday that regardless of what happens to the men, "it won't bring Brian back."

"It will never be over," she said. "But at least we don't have to relive what we've relived these last three weeks, over and over."

Jurors heard 8 1/2 days of testimony before they began deliberating Wednesday afternoon.

According to testimony, Wagner and two friends were driving around downtown Emporia when they stopped in an alley to check on some women who were arguing.

Shortly after they stopped, four men, including the three defendants, entered the parking lot.

The men began fighting, and Wagner later was discovered unconscious on the ground by one of his friends. He never regained consciousness.

After dismissing the jury, District Court Judge Lee Fowler approved a motion from Lyon County Attorney Joe Lee to revoke bond for each of the men and have them returned to jail until their sentencing.

Susan Riley, a family friend, released a statement after the jury's verdict was announced.

"It is the Pendley family's sincere hope that the Wagner family found peace and closure to this tragedy," she said. "We're totally in shock. We will continue to love and support Rex Pendley."

Agility workshop gives dogs opportunity to strut their stuff

It was a beauty pageant of sorts.

Never mind that on her first try, Muffy refused to walk the course. Or that Ginger ran away at the sight of others.

There still was plenty of encouragement.

"Nice turn. Beautiful. Did you see the body language on that?" said Jeanne Saddler, dog trainer for the Heartland Dog Training Program.

The agility workshop she directed Saturday and Sunday welcomed all sorts of dogs and their owners.

Dogs in agility competitions run an obstacle course with hurdles and tunnels.

"Agility doesn't discriminate," Susan Portz, a Manhattan resident, said. "It's just a sport for any type of dog."

Portz's dog is Sasha, a yellow Labrador she found abandoned in front of her house. Although Portz's other dog has competed in agility events, she said she hopes Sasha will pick up knowledge and skills at this workshop so she can start competing.

Other owners, however, had different reasons for attending the workshop.

Galaxy is 10 years old but still has plenty of energy left, said Rita Dole, his owner and a Riley, Kan. resident.

"He's a climber. So I thought, why not put this to good use?" Dole said. "I wanted to do something with our dog, so I have something else to do besides say no, no, no."

Galaxy, like Sasha, was abandoned. Dole said she was sitting on the porch of her house when he came running through her yard. Nobody claimed him, so she said she decided to keep him.

The best part about this agility workshop is seeing him improve and jump over the hurdles, Dole said.

"I want him to learn how to do all things better so we can do some of these things for recreation," she said.

Some owners traveled three hours so their dogs could enjoy the workshop.

Ruth Ann Furze and her dog, Bandit, woke up at 6 Saturday morning so they could travel from Hays to Manhattan. This was their second trip for an agility workshop.

"They think it's fun," Furze said. "It occupies their minds. It gives them something to think about and something to do."

This was also the reason Sir Tuck was at the event.

"It was recommended by a K-State vet that he come," Lynn Botbyl, a Manhattan resident, said. "He's so active that she thought it would be good COUNCIL GROVE, Kan. — A homeowner was charged with shooting and killing a teen-ager as three youths sped away from the man's property, authorities said.

Robert Keith Cordray, 49, was charged Friday with first-degree murder and two counts of aggravated assault, said Scott Teeselink, special agent with the Kansas Bureau of Investigation.

Cordray was ordered held on $250,000 bond after an arrest warrant was signed by District Court Judge John O. Sanderson.

Scott R. Brown, a junior at Council Grove High School, died Wednesday night after the shooting outside a home in northern Lyon County.

The two other teens were injured either by flying glass or bullet fragments.

The two injured boys were trying to get Brown to a hospital when they County's non-violent crime rate falls

By SHANNON DELMEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Riley County reported that crime in 1999 was 14.7 percent lower than the figures for 1998.

Steve French, Riley County Police Department assistant director, said there is no way to know exactly why the crime rate has decreased, but he said he thought it might be due to the economy.

"I think that is one reason why you are seeing crime drop," he said. "People all have jobs that want to work."

"All the indications are that crime is in a down cycle, but it's a nationwide trend right now that crime is going down."

Riley County is below the national average for crimes per capita, French said.

Despite the fact that crime is down overall, not everything showed a decrease.

"We know that murder is up," French said. "We had four homicides this year. In 1998, we had two homicides in this area. We had 13 rapes in 1998, and we had 18 this year."

French said it is hard to determine why these crimes increased.

"As to why we went up in homicides, we are only dealing with numbers two and four," he said. "There is just no way for me to say why we had four this year and only two last year. One of those was a suicide/homicide, and the other one was an intruder breaking into a home. Then we have the two that we are still working on that are unsolved. We are still looking for motives and working on motives for those cases."

He said this year the county saw an increase in rapes that might be due to more crimes being reported.

"I certainly hope what we are seeing is an increase in willingness to reach out to the police as opposed to an increase in incidents," said Judy Davis, executive director of the Crisis Center.

But, she said there is no way to know for sure.

Lt. John Doehling, of the RCPD said despite the increases in rape and murder, Riley County is a safe community.

"Of course safety is situational," he said. "At two or three o'clock in the Kansas man kills parents, takes own life in house fire

HOYT, Kan. — Authorities believe a man fatally shot his parents, wounded a deputy who came to investigate, then died in a fire he had set that burned his home to the ground as authorities surrounded it.

No motive was known Saturday for the outbreak of violence that led authorities Friday to the rural northeast Kansas home.

Jackson County authorities tentatively identified the man whose body was found badly burned inside the wood-frame house as Ilesh Ashok Abdir, 27.

The bodies of a man and woman whom authorities believe to be his parents were found about 500 yards from the home in a field near the edge of some woods. They tentatively were identified as Snettalata Shimpi, 58, and Ashok Shimpi, 59.

Authorities said they could not positively identify the victims until autopsies were complete.

Investigators on Saturday were using a backhoe to excavate the house, which collapsed into the basement as a result of the intense fire that spread black smoke into the air.

It was not known how the fire was set, Jackson County Sheriff Daina Durham said. Authorities had kept firefighters away Friday out of fear that they would be shot at if they tried to approach the burning building.

The episode began when the employer of the slain woman reported that she had not been to work for two days and asked authorities to check on her.

Jackson County Deputy Jack Schoen went to the house and tried to enter through an unlocked front door.

He was shot in the upper chest, apparently by a shotgun. Schoen, who was wearing a bulletproof vest, ran back to his car to radio for help.

In a 911 call from the residence, a man said, "I shot your officer ... send more," Durham said.

Durham said the man's intent was to "kill cops."

Durham said she had visited Schoen in the hospital in Topeka and that he was doing well with injuries to his arms, hands and face.

"He's pretty banged up," the sheriff said. "His bulletproof vest saved his life." Durham and Scott Teeslink, a special agent with the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, said it was not clear how, when or where the two parents were killed.

Shea, Wooten announce 2nd student body presidential campaign

Aaron Shea, senior in secondary education, and Rick Wooten, senior in broadcasting stand on top of the bar at Aggie Lounge Friday afternoon to announce their bid for student body president and vice president.

By DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Aaron Shea and Rick Wooten said they were disappointed in the way things turned out after last year's election.

They kicked off their second campaign for student body president and vice president Friday afternoon at the Aggie Lounge.

"We saw it happen again," Wooten said. "People get elected, and then nothing happens."

The pair ran for student body president and vice president last year. Wooten, senior in broadcasting, ran for president, and Shea, senior in secondary education, ran for vice president. This year, the offices they are running for are reversed, but several issues from last year's campaign remain the same.

"One issue from last year is the proper removal of Tom Asbury," Wooten, student body vice presidential candidate, said. "How many in a row is it now? It's more than fingers."

Shea, presidential candidate, said another important issue from their last campaign is campus beautification. He said if elected, he would like to see a fountain placed in the free speech zone.

However, Wooten said they also will focus on new issues in their "Dream it today, do it tomorrow," campaign this year.

He said they have paid close attention to new issues on campus since the last election and were upset with the Student Senate resolution supporting a city-wide ban on smoking in public places.

"If Lucky's (BrewGrille) or Porter's want to get rid of smoking in their bars, that's fine," he said. "But there will always be smoking in this bar."

The pair also said they would like to get more people involved in student government if elected.

"We want more minorities, more independents and NASCAR fans," Wooten said. "Hopefully, we can get them on some of the committees."

He said another issue they would like to examine is how K-State students now are represented in Student Senate.

"There needs to be a division other than colleges," he said.

The pair also would tackle campaign finances.

"Not to steal thunder from John McCain," Wooten said. "But we are for campaign finance reform."

Shea said the amount it costs to run a successful student body president campaign might keep some students out of the process.

Candidates for student body president can spend up to $3,000 on campaigns, he said.

"That's too much," Shea said.

Fair helps students find major

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is working to make choosing a major an easier decision for students by offering the Academic Majors Fair on Wednesday.

The fair, sponsored by the Academic and Career Information Center, will be on the second floor of the K-State Student Union from noon to 4 p.m.

Karen Pence, assistant dean of human ecology and fair co-chairwoman, said there will be representatives from more than 50 of the academic programs on campus at the fair.

Pence said last spring was the first time the fair was held, and the turnout was very impressive with about 500 students attending.

Several new elements have been added to the fair since last year. A question table will be set up at the front of the room for students who do not know what academic area they need to go to for a certain major. Several college services will be at the fair as well, such as Career and Employment Services and the Academic and Career Information Center.

Pence said the fair is a convenient way for students who are trying to decide on a major, minor or secondary major to find out valuable information in a short period of time.

"The fair is informal," Pence said. "It is something that students could come by and visit in between classes."

Tinsley Furry, director of the Academic and Career Information Center and co-chair, said the fair is a benefit to students because of its convenience.

"K-State is a big campus," Furry said. "It can be frustrating to try to go to all the campus offices if you are trying to decide on a major, minor or secondary major. This is a very easy way to get all the information you need in one location on one day."

Pence said the fair is for all students who might be looking to taking on a new challenge at K-State, but can be very beneficial to freshmen who are not quite set in their ways.

"Freshman students are encouraged to come to the fair, especially those in open-option," Pence said. "But the fair can be beneficial to upperclassman students as well who may be looking at a dual major."

Tiffany German, senior in human resource management and student volunteer for the fair, said the fair can be helpful to many students.

"I signed up to help at the fair because I thought that the volunteer opportunity looked like a good one," German said. "But I think that with the fair students could get some good ideas on what to do with their academic careers."

Egg-drop event to teach students physics, teamwork

By TAMARA MANN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas middle school students will shape a potentially shattering experience into an educational day.

These students will be participating in the annual egg-drop event sponsored by K-State's chapter of the National Society of Professional Engineers.

The event will take place Feb. 23 in Durland Hall. Seven middle and junior high school will send 117 students from Kansas will be grouped into 33 teams to create a safety device that will protect an egg.

The eggs will be dropped from the third floor of the Durland atrium.

Students will have about two hours to design a safety device out of the materials they are given. Previously, they have been a combination of simple everyday materials.

"I believe in the years past students have been given poster board, paper clips, rubber bands and simple things like that," said Stephanie Billups, junior in industrial engineering and NSPE member. "About 70 percent of the eggs survived last year. We thought that was a pretty high number, so we hope to make it a little more challenging this year."

Billups said last year's devices ranged from basket cradles made with an attached parachute, to poster board that had been formed into a cone to protect the egg.

Students will be judged based on two criteria.

The team with the most creative idea and the team with the most splat are two of the categories to be awarded.

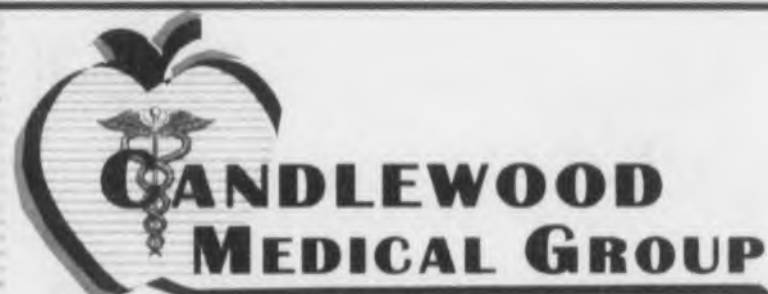

"Their objective is to build an apparatus out of the materials they are given," said Eric Byer, senior in manufacturing systems engineering and NSPE president. "Of the eggs that don't break, the three lightest in weight will win."

Students at Eisenhower Middle School participating in the event are required to write an essay stating the reasons why they should be able to participate and what ideas they have in mind.

"Due to limited space, we are only able to allow around 10 students to participate. It is a good way to get ideas flowing beforehand," said Chris Herrald, eighth grade science teacher at Eisenhower Middle School.

The teachers think this is not only a good way to integrate a physics problem into their science lessons, but also a great way to experience working as a team, Herrald said.

"This event allows students to experience working together as a team, which is a beneficial experience for them," Herrald said.

Collegian election coverage will be informative, fair

Student Senate is responsible for allocating funds from campus privilege fees, creating policies for the campus and lobbying the Kansas Legislature.

K-State's student body president is the main lobbyist to the state Legislature. He also is in contact with the Kansas Board of Regents and serves as the primary representative of K-State.

College Councils, Union Governing Board and Fine Arts Council also have important responsibilities that most likely will affect every K-State student in some way.

With such important duties, choosing a student government should not be done haphazardly. When students cast their ballots, it is important that they are well-informed about the people for whom they are voting.

To help students toward this end, the Collegian will be providing extensive coverage of the student-government elections in the upcoming two weeks to inform students before the elections March 6-8.

The Collegian will begin by covering the announcements of candidacy by all those parties who have filed for student body president and vice president.

After these announcements, it also will offer readers a profile on each of the candidates, their platforms and post-election plans. On the day of each these profiles, the Collegian also will provide space on the Opinion page for candidates to voice their concerns and platforms.

During the course of these two weeks, the Collegian also will feature a series of stories that confront issues on campus and list each presidential candidate's stance on the issue.

On the final Friday before elections, the Collegian — in that day's editorial — will endorse one of the presidential tickets. This will be done after members of the board have interviewed each candidate and considered each candidate's platform.

The last piece of information the Collegian will offer is a voter's guide, which will be available March 6, the first day of balloting. This will be a useful supplement for voters who might need a quick refresher on the stance of any candidate for any position in student government.

During these next few weeks, the Collegian will do its best to inform readers of issues and candidates' stances on those issues.

However, in order to avoid any possibility of biasing voters for or against any candidate undeservedly, the Collegian will not publish any letters or calls to the Campus Fourum that take a specific stand toward a candidate. We will, however, continue to publish letters relating to issues that are disputed in the election — as long as they do not mention or allude to a certain candidate.

Although the Collegian will do its best to inform students, those students must do their part. Follow the issues. Read the stories. Stay informed.

Only an informed electorate will be able to choose the best possible student government.

OUR VIEW: an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

mudslinging for the VOTE

Elections should focus on important issues, not personal morality

Let's face it.

A lot of people smoked pot in the 1960s. It was the drug of choice, easily accessible and widely accepted as the thing to do.

So what makes us think a person who happens to be a politician now never smoked a joint or had relations with a stranger. Did every politician know for certain he was going to run for president when he was 20? I highly doubt it.

Obviously, times have changed. Where these (and other) activities once were widely permissible and even expected to a degree, they now are seen widely as morally wrong. Therefore, it has become fashionable to dredge up presidential candidates' pasts and throw it in their faces.

KATIE SUTTON

I have noticed that nowadays campaigns for the position of president have turned into a competition of who can find the most dirt on the other candidate.

It all started about eight years ago when it was brought to America's attention that our current president, Bill Clinton, smoked a little weed when he was younger.

I say, so what? No one can say they did not make at least one potentially bad decision in the past or when they were young.

What I find most amusing about it is that absolutely no one cares until this person runs for the position of head of our country. True, the president sets an example for the United States as a whole, and if he were drugged up during office, then, yes, we might have a problem.

But what relevance does something inconsequential that happened years ago have on a person's ability to deal with present issues? I think restoring social security or eliminating the deficit is just a tad bit more important than what "immoral" things the candidate did in college or early adulthood.

So what brought on these sudden heated feelings? In the Feb. 16 issue of The Kansas City Star there was an article about a recent debate — the last before the South

YOU ARE A DOODOO-HEAD!

MY DADDY CAN BEAT UP YOUR DADDY!!

SOUTH CAROLINA PRIMARIES

HAI JENG/Collegian

Carolina primary on Saturday.

There were three candidates in attendance: Sen. John McCain of Arizona, Texas Gov. George W. Bush, and Alan Keyes. According to The Star, Bush and McCain spent most of the 90-minute debate attacking each other.

Ironically, the attack was an attack on previous negative campaigning. So, instead of letting it go and dealing with the issues, they decided to try to make the other look like a bad guy. Apparently, they think this will sway voters' opinions.

I know mine will not change. And, on second thought, I don't even know whom to vote for because everyone is so busy smearing the other candidate's reputation.

Keyes had it right when he addressed the audience saying, "Is this the kind of pointless squabbling we really want them [the television audience] to see?" According to The Star, "the studio audience applauded" in response.

I guess I'm not alone in my sentiments. In closing, I would like to leave you with a little quiz to answer. And make sure you read all the questions before you look at the answers, please.

Question: It is time to elect the world leader, and your vote counts. Here are the facts about the three leading candidates:

Candidate A: Associates with crooked politicians and consults with astrologists. He has had two mistresses. He also chain smokes and drinks eight to 10 martinis a day.

Candidate B: He was kicked out of office twice, sleeps until noon, used opium in college and drinks a quart of whiskey every evening.

Candidate C: He is a decorated war hero. He is a vegetarian, does not smoke, drinks an occasional beer and has not had any extramarital affairs.

After being presented with this "moral" and "immoral" behavior, which of these candidates would be your choice?

Answers: Candidate A is Franklin D. Roosevelt, Candidate B is Winston Churchill, and Candidate C is Adolph Hitler. This just shows you never know.

And maybe we should be concerned about important issues, not personal morality.

Reconciliation, forgiving past keys to improving race relations

One of my favorite songs, when I first became a fan of the multi-platinum rap/rock/alternative/pop/R&B group de Talk, was "Walls." I liked it mainly because of the sound, a fusion of rap and rock. But the song's message, dealing with racism, confused me at first. I certainly agreed that racism was wrong, and it was a good thing to condemn, but it seemed redundant to write a song about a problem that, I figured, was pretty much solved.

I figured wrong. Yes, this nation has made tremendous progress in the area of civil rights. There are now many successful blacks in every profession and at every strata of society. Segregation is over, discrimination is illegal, and almost no one claims that one race is superior to another. Most major corporations in the United States actively recruit minorities, as do numerous colleges and scholarship programs.

We are almost there. But we have not yet reached the goal, and we cannot quit when it is in sight.

Data from the U.S. Justice Department indicates that blacks often receive harsher sentences than whites. According to the U.S. Public Health Service only 14 percent of drug users are black, but blacks receive 74 percent of prison sentences for drug charges. And the Applied Research Center has found that black students are more likely to be expelled from high school than white students for the same offense.

There still seems to be a divide separating blacks and whites in America. We go to different churches. We belong to different organizations. We each withdraw to our own social group. Overt hate and prejudice are rare, but mistrust, suspicion, apathy and subtle prejudice are all too common.

This is a problem which cannot be solved by ad campaigns, government programs or diversity training. It is a problem of individuals and their relationships. Ultimately, it is a problem of the human heart.

I have refrained from addressing racial issues before because it did not seem there was anything worthwhile I could contribute.

Everyone knows there is a problem, and at least a few weeks out of the year everyone talks about what we could do to solve it. Everybody is talking, but nobody is doing anything.

What we need, in a word, is reconciliation. Reconciliation is when we choose, not to forget the past, but to forgive the past and look beyond it. Reconciliation is when we acknowledge where we have been wrong and make things right. Reconciliation is when we choose to step outside our little clique of friends and sit down beside someone at lunch who is different from us. It is as simple as reaching out and building a friendship.

Ultimately, reconciliation is motivated by the realization of a profound truth: that all human beings, regardless of color, ethnicity, handicap or other differences, are created in the image of God.

In Galatians 3:28, Paul makes this radical statement: "There is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus." The realization that Christ died for each and every person, regardless of their position or heritage, precludes arrogance and compels brotherly love.

At the foot of the Cross, we are all equal. (I intend to address the issue of the Bible and slavery in next week's column).

So this is how I strive to see all people, as priceless and intentional creations of God. Some might have been damaged and tarnished by the ugliness of sin, yet they are never beyond redemption.

I now have come to realize why de Talk, a biracial group who once described themselves, tongue in cheek, as "two honks and a negro," is so committed to addressing racism and working for reconciliation. As they sing in their 1995 song "Colored People," "Ignorance has wronged some races / And vengeance is the Lord's / If we aspire to share this space/ Repentance is the cure."

Reconciliation is what we need.

Variety of opinions move everyone closer to truth

Editor,

Lying beneath the surface of many of the past several weeks' columns and letters is a troubling fundamental concept. The theme of relative truth is not only false but also illogical.

All too often, we hear, "What is right for you might not be right for me," or in response to a controversial column, "Your opinion is your opinion, but what about those who disagree?"

First of all, the purpose of a column is not to satisfy everyone but to express one's viewpoint openly. Do not fault those who do this, even if they employ a biblical line of thought. Jeff Elliott, for example, is not "telling us how we should live our lives," as one misled writer complained, but offering his ideas for our consideration and, perhaps, rejection.

Christianity, right or wrong, is as legitimate a belief system as conservatism, liberalism, feminism or any other prevalent philosophy of our time.

Whatever one's opinion on a matter might be, we all must acknowledge that there is an ultimate truth.

We might differ on what that truth is, but to say that each one of us is governed by an original, yet legitimate truth is ludicrous.

The idea that truth changes relative to various situations and individuals merely is a small-minded cop-out to avoid controversy. With no acknowledgement of an ultimate truth, a people and a nation have no unified foundation on which to stand and no set of values to defend honorably.

Our nation's forefathers recognized the existence of ultimate truth when they stated, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights..."

Just as our nation continually seeks to identify these "self-evident truths," we, as individuals, must strive to discover truth more fully. Once we recognize that there is one truth and not a hodgepodge of varying ideas that equally are correct, we can assess various opinions — and religions — for what they are — an honest attempt at pursuing truth.

This realization offers a greater perspective toward the wide range of viewpoints we read in the Collegian daily. Right or wrong, columnists are sharing their beliefs in a genuine effort to move us all closer to truth. Scott Roney and Jeff Elliott find their Bible-based faith a strong case for truth.

By condemning them for their courageous writings, one not only inhibits a free exchange of truth-seeking ideas but also displays the same close-mindedness he so often condemns.

Strip mall false solution to bring revenue to city

Editor,

Just say no to strip malls.

That is the most ridiculous of all the ideas I've heard this year in regard to bringing revenue to Manhattan.

Don't we have enough high-dollar-rent strip malls in this town? And what would go into this haven for overpriced shops/boutiques — another auto-parts store, or how about any other crappy little junk-peddling establishment that only will force the bank to foreclose after the owner has hocked his or her mother's teeth and the last of his or her precious belongings just to make ends meet?

I think this idea won't hold water at all and is no solution to bringing extra money to Manhattan. I think that there are several viable solutions.

The first is to pump some action into our downtown, which got smothered by that worthless Manhattan Town Center. Second, revamp Aggieville and get rid of some of those trashy boutiques — maybe more like Massachusetts Street in Lawrence.

Aggieville cannot hold a candle to that place. Don't be fooled; I am a true Wildcat. It's just that I think we should have more pride in our little corner of the world and not let this establishment tarnish our school's image. (The football players already have spoken for that role.)

Besides, wouldn't you rather see another overpriced, paper-thin-walled, gargantuan apartment built there instead?

Forming political parties bad idea for divisive KSU

Editor,

I am writing in response to a column written by Travis Weigel on Friday. However, this is not simply a rebuttal to his viewpoint. It is rather a small commentary on the state of affairs on our campus.

In an effort to ease the dissonance in the voting system, Weigel suggests members of our campus form political parties along greek and non-greek lines. While I am sure his intentions are good, I am not sure I agree.

As it stands today, greek and non-greek students, whether provoked or not, constantly sling mud at each other. By forming political parties, we might only serve to organize this mudslinging.

Also, his suggestion to create specialty seats — while it might statistically reduce the greek dominance in Senate — would limit long-term seats for those people dedicated to our campus and its principles.

The beautiful thing about an election process is everyone gets to make decisions based on issues. Whether politicians choose to solicit votes through greek or non-greek appeals is their own prerogative.

As a bipartisan student at K-State, I refuse to believe that by pitting people against each other we do much more than make ourselves look bad.

Lately, though, that is all we have been doing. Whether it is (basketball coach Tom) Asbury, (student body president Jason) Heinrich, greeks, (university president Jon) Wefald or whoever, our harsh words only serve to make our campus look like a bunch of uneducated, slack-jawed hooligans.

Therefore, as a plea to true K-Staters, I offer a simple suggestion: Instead of worrying about what everyone else is doing to ruin things, look first to see what you can do to improve the situation.

If we seek first to understand, then we seek to be understood, we will all be better off.

Missouri fan sees lack of school pride at KSU

Editor,

I guess I am what you would call a sports fanatic.

On any given day, if there is a sporting event scheduled, you're sure to find me there. That's why this past Saturday, when the University of Missouri men's basketball team traveled to Manhattan, I, along with some other loyal Tiger fans, followed our team across the state line.

I am a member of the Student Athletic Board at Missouri, where we are dedicated to promoting and assisting the athletic department of the University of Missouri and promoting school spirit. Obviously, the fans of K-State have yet to figure out what school spirit is exactly. Everyone knows that no matter what, you can't constantly be on the winning side of things, but why can't you support your team through both the good times and the bad?

The Missouri fans, about 20 college students in particular, continually were criticized by those from K-State. Granted, we weren't sitting in our assigned seats for most of the game, but when there are thousands of empty seats, anyone's natural response is to move closer to the court.

We were asked several times to present our tickets to ushers, while K-State fans moved closer to where the action was without even a second glance. Yes, we do attract attention to ourselves — we're a lively bunch — but we weren't harassing anyone.

We were yelling for our team, letting them know that we had traveled 4 1/2 hours to see them play. We brought signs, yet another form of expressing our support for Mizzou. Please note: We do all of these things at the Hearnes Center. It's not like we made an extra effort to bombard you with Tiger paraphernalia just because we were coming to Manhattan. I'm sure the K-State players noticed us when they visited Columbia. We attract attention to ourselves — that's our point.

Football season is long since past. It's time to support another team that works as hard as the Cats on the gridiron and deserve as much respect.

If you happen to be losing a basketball game, don't start ranting and raving about all of your wins this past football season, it's irrelevant — this is basketball season. Tickets for your games are $6.

Fork over the change and show some class, school spirit and support for your school.

Editorial Board assumes people follow belt laws

Editor,

I must disagree with Friday's editorial. Making not wearing your seat belt a primary offense will not get people to buckle up.

You mentioned Derrick Thomas' unfortunate accident but failed to mention how, in Missouri, this law is already in place.

Looks like it didn't help Thomas.

When you make statements like this one, you assume that people will follow the law as they should. But every day's page 2 is filled with those who didn't.

The current law is fine as it is. Let's leave it that way.

11 AND COUNTING

Missouri's Jeff Hafer grabs Kenyatta Dix's arm as they scramble for a ball in the second half of Saturday's game at Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats lost the game 84-74.

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/COLLEGIAN

Wildcats fall at home against Tigers, bringing record to 8-15

When it rains, it pours. It was raining Missouri three-pointers Saturday, when the Tigers defeated the K-State Wildcats 84-74 at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Tigers (16-8, 9-3) used 12 first-half three-pointers to build a lead they never would relinquish.

Despite trailing by as many as 14 in the second half, the Cats (8-15, 1-11) managed to pull within eight points five times and within seven once, but could not get over the hump.

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER

Just when K-State, mired in an 11-game losing streak, would narrow Missouri's lead to single digits, the Tigers would fire back with a basket.

"They shot the ball better from the field," head coach Tom Asbury said. "They're a great shooting team by evidence of the fact that they were 24 of 27 from the line, shot 43 percent from the three."

"That's tough to beat. They played very very well against us. Give them all the credit."

Six of the Tigers' first seven field goals were three-pointers as they jumped quickly to a 22-8 lead with 13:29 left in the half. Missouri started the contest by making all six of its attempts from beyond the arc.

"They just came out firing away and hitting everything they put up," senior forward-guard Josh Reid said. "We just had a tough time stopping them there in the first half."

Considering 12 of Missouri's 14 first-half field goals were three-pointers, Asbury had nothing but praise.

"I thought Missouri played as well against us in the first half as anyone we've played all year," Asbury said. "And with the addition of Kareem Rush, they're even obviously a much more potent team."

Rush, who scored 19 points Saturday, was not in the lineup for round one of this year's series between K-State and Missouri because he was serving a nine-game suspension for accepting gifts from an AAU coach.

Rush was just one of five Tigers to score in double figures. Leading the way for the Tigers was sophomore guard Keyon Dooling's 20 points.

Despite shooting nearly 60 percent from the field in the first half, Asbury said the difference in the game was Missouri's long-range shooting.

"If they don't go 12 for 19 from the three-point line, it's obviously an entirely different game," Asbury said. "When they do that, you're going to be in trouble."

Asbury's fate to be evaluated after end of basketball season

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State head coach Tom Asbury's future with the school will be re-evaluated after the season, athletic director Max Urlick said Saturday.

In other words, nothing has changed, Urlick said.

"It's not ethical, nor is it productive, so there is a time when we look at every coach and every season, and we evaluate the rest of the staff," Urlick said. "The time is not now.

"With any sport, it would have to be when the season is over," Urlick said.

K-State senior forward Josh Reid said Asbury gave the team a few days off to regroup last week after the team's 94-65 loss to Kansas on Feb. 12.

"We took a few days off, and coach was real smart for doing that," Reid said. "It's been kind of tough, and we got a chance to clear our minds a little bit. We went back to work and had a great week."

Morrison suspended from team

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State guard Galen Morrison has been suspended from the team for the remainder of the season because of disciplinary reasons, the K-State men's basketball program announced Saturday in a release.

Representatives of the program would not comment any further.

Morrison was averaging 11.9 points a game this season and had scored in double figures in 11 of his past 16 games. Earlier this season he was the Big 12 Conference Player of the Week after averaging 22.5 points in games against Nebraska and Long Beach State.

However, he made remarks critical of K-State after a 71-56 loss to Oklahoma State. He criticized all aspects of the program.

In a Jan. 27 Collegian article, Morrison said he was frustrated.

"Coaches, plain and simple. Coaches," Morrison said then. "I'm just getting fed up with a lot of stuff. I don't know what the problem is."

"It's real hard to stay focused. It's frustrating for me, especially. I went into this game feeling that I had to play a good game. Otherwise, I might not be starting or might not play. So, there is a whole lot of things that are frustrating."

He also said after that game that nobody was blaming anyone.

"No one is pointing fingers at anyone," Morrison said. "We go out and try to use a team effort to win. Everyone is staying positive."

Pressure mounts as basketball team meets season's end

We are finding out a lot about the K-State men's basketball program now, aren't we?

K-State lost its 11th straight Saturday when it succumbed to Missouri, and you could see the pressure start to boil over.

K-State shot the ball pretty well. It was shooting 59 percent in the first half but still trailed by 10 points at halftime, because Missouri was draining threes like they were rain drops falling out of the sky.

Missouri freshman Kareem Rush was magical in the first half, and the Tigers as a team seemed like they could not miss from downtown. It is hard to say if many teams in the country could have beaten Missouri on Saturday — it was just that good.

During the game, K-State worked to close the lead only to have it increased by a Missouri three.

That has been K-State's story this season. It has been good enough to make runs and stay in some games but it has never made it over the hump.

Against Missouri, the Cats got some pretty decent performances from some players. Kenyatta Dix filled in nicely where the now-suspended Galen Morrison had played. Dix scored 22 points and had three assists. It was a gallant effort, the kind that would be rewarded most of the time with adulation and kind words. Instead, all anyone can think of, and deservedly so, is the fact that K-State is 8-15 overall and 1-11 in conference play.

All anyone can talk about is the future of head coach Tom Asbury and the state of the men's basketball program. The questions run rampant, and the rumors heighten daily. It is a circus, and the spectacle takes away from the play on the floor.

The more difficult question is, how did this program go from a once proud basketball school that fought for Big 8 and later Big 12 conference titles? A program that has past coaches and players like Tex Winter, Jack Hartman, Lon Kruger, Steve Henson and Mitch Richmond, to name a few.

A program that saw Ahearn Field House rock on frigid winter nights, and where the legends of K-State basketball once played to the delight of capacity crowds.

A program that, led by Richmond, made it to the Elite Eight in 1988 before losing to Kansas.

However, that was a long time ago, before anyone had ever heard of Bill Snyder. Before the words "Manhattan miracle" ever applied to football. The campus was a much different place then. Bramlage Coliseum had never been played in.

It is weird to think of the times when Ahearn was jamming because now "boos" are heard off and on. It felt strange to listen Saturday to the Missouri fans cheering louder than the K-State crowd.

So what is the team's future? Well, they play Wednesday at home against Texas A&M. A win against the Aggies would not change much, but it would secure an overall winning record at home.

Baseball team ends 3-day play with 2-3 record

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State struggled from the mound during the three-day Arco San Diego Baseball Showcase.

The Cats dropped two of three games, and their record slipped to 2-3 on the season.

The Wildcats were blasted by San Diego on Thursday 31-15 to open the tournament. The Toreros matched K-State's run total in the third inning alone by scoring 15 runs, which pushed their lead to 20-1 after three innings.

Five K-State hurlers took the mound in the game, with only freshman Todd Lundwall escaping without raising his ERA. Jason Wells started and lost his first decision of the year. The senior right hander pitched two innings, giving up nine runs on eight hits, while striking out one and walking two.

Junior third baseman Josh Cavender and junior left fielder Kasey Weishaar sparked K-State from the plate against San Diego, each pounding out three hits and three RBIs.

K-State also had two players hit their first home runs of the season. Senior designated hitter Travis Andre' and junior first baseman Mark English each cracked their first of the year.

On Friday the Cats' road woes continued, as K-State took a beating from Big 12 Conference rival Oklahoma State, losing 15-4.

Junior pitcher Scott Tallman lost his first decision as a Wildcat. He allowed 10 runs on 11 hits in 3 2/3 innings, while striking out two and walking four.

Oklahoma State gave up six hits to the Cats, with sophomore catcher Tim Doty and Cavender supplying two hits a piece.

The Cats turned things around Saturday by combining solid pitching and hitting in a 21-4 exhibition win against CETYS University of Mexico.

Freshman right hander Spencer Black picked up the win from the mound in the first start of his career. He threw 4 2/3 innings, giving up four runs on seven hits.

Fellow freshman Keith Gernant pitched the rest of the way, allowing only three hits while striking out two and walking three.

K-State pounded out 13 hits against CETYS, while showing patience at the plate by recording nine walks.

Senior second baseman Chad Tabor drove in four runs and notched his first triple of the season, while also scoring a pair of runs himself.

Women's basketball team loses in Lawrence

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

LAWRENCE — The K-State women's basketball team started and ended its game well against Kansas on Saturday.

It was the 26 minutes in between that spelled doom for the Cats in their 61-43 loss to the Jayhawks.

K-State head coach Deb Patterson said it was her team's poorest offensive performance of the season.

"Offensively, it was one of the poorest games we've ever played," Patterson said. "I'd like to think we're better than we played today. But what you bring to the floor is what you are, and today we just weren't very good."

For the first 10 1/2 minutes of the game, K-State (12-14, 5-8) held its own against the No. 24 Jayhawks (19-6, 10-3). The Cats evened the score at 14-14 at the 9:28 mark in the first half when guard Kim Woodlee followed her own missed shot with a basket, but Kansas proceeded to go on a 19-6 run that gave the Jayhawks a 33-20 halftime lead.

The second half started even worse. K-State did not score its first field goal until 4 1/2 minutes into the half and did not score its third basket until the 6:05 mark. In the meantime, Kansas increased its lead to 54-30.

The Cats could not find any offensive rhythm. Throughout the game, K-State scored field goals on consecutive possessions only three times, and two of those instances were in the game's final two minutes.

■ See JAYHAWKS on PAGE 7

A diamond in the rough

The Cats' lone positive mark was center Olga Firsova's rebounding. Firsova grabbed 15 rebounds, three times as many than any other player in the game and a season high. Firsova also scored 10 points and blocked four shots.

Lining up

After using seven different lineups during the season, head coach Deb Patterson finally might have decided on one. The Cats have started the same lineup of Kristin Rethman, Angie Finkes, Nicky Ramage, Kim Woodlee and Morgen Finneran the past three games and have gone 2-1.

Strength of schedule

According to the current Ratings Performance Index poll, K-State plays the 11th-strongest schedule in the country. Kansas was the sixth ranked team the Cats have played this season.

Up next

The Cats will play the No. 18 Oklahoma Sooners at 7 p.m. Tuesday in Bramlage Coliseum.

TIGERS

K-State freshman guard Kenyatta Dix led all scorers with a career-high 22 points in 26 minutes of play and committed no turnovers.

"Kenyatta is a great player," Reid said. "He does a good job. He comes out and works hard every day, and I think he really matured tonight, and that's going to show up down the road."

Dix got his opportunity for more playing time after junior point guard Galen Morrison was suspended for the remainder of the season for disciplinary reasons. Morrison was the Cats' third-leading scorer this season, averaging 12 points a game and shooting 43.5 percent from beyond the arc.

Senior forward Tony Kitt scored 18 points and grabbed 14 rebounds in the game as well.

K-State will try to put an end to its longest losing streak since the 1945-46 season when it faces Texas A&M 7 p.m. Wednesday night at Bramlage.

of practice to prepare for this game, then came out and played a heck of a game today."

It was the 11th straight loss for K-State (8-15, 1-11) and matches the Cats' longest losing streak since 1945. The loss also dropped Asbury's all-time record at K-State to 84-84.

The rumors regarding Asbury are still rumors, Urlick said.

"I think I hear the same thing you do," he said. "I think this is part of the territory."

Urlick also spoke about the attendance, saying it is disappointing when the team is not winning.

"Sure, it is disappointing because they work hard. They are good young men, and the coaches work hard," Urlick said. "So, based on that, I would like to see them (fans) come out and support them, but I understand why they are not."

Asbury, who will not discuss his future publicly, and the Cats have a chance Wednesday to snap their losing streak against Texas A&M at Bramlage Coliseum. A victory would give K-State a winning record at home this season.

MORRISON

Morrison was not available for comment Sunday.

However, after Saturday's game, K-State athletic director Max Urlick said he did not know the specifics of the situation, but he said February can be a difficult time of year.

"I really don't know about that," he said. "I saw the release this morning, so I am not privy to whatever took place. Usually when things like that happen, you all have to understand that this is February, and the last of February there is a disease in basketball where pressures mount, and people say things and do things that they normally wouldn't do."

"Kind of take it as a part of the February rush, and the tension of the last part of February, when you wrap a season up."

K-State head coach Tom Asbury said he was not sure whether Morrison was still in school.

"I don't know. I assume so," Asbury said.

With Morrison out, redshirt freshman Kenyatta Dix filled in and scored 22 points, doubling his previous career high of 11 points.

Senior forward Josh Reid said it was nice to see Dix perform.

"He was a huge spark for us," Reid said. "He matured a lot today, and that's going to help us a lot down the road."

The result was K-State's lowest offensive output of the year. Senior forward Angie Finkes scored four points, hitting one of four shots. Center Olga Firsova scored 10 points but shot four of 14 from the field.

Patterson said the Cats had difficulty handling the Kansas half-court defense.

"They're so aggressive on the ball, denying the next pass," Patterson said of the Jayhawks. "They just do a great job of keeping hands up, staying in stance, being physical and really sustaining that over the course of a 40-minute game."

K-State has gone 53 years with a winning home record. It is the school's one real link to the past. If it ends, it might be hard for the program to bounce back.

It also would take a little pressure off Asbury.

Perhaps it was the prospect of an 11-game losing streak or the constant rumors regarding his job. Maybe it was the fact that he had suspended junior guard Galen Morrison for the remainder of the season, but the pressures boiled over when Asbury picked up a technical foul in the second half on Saturday.

The Jayhawks' pressure defense forced the Cats into 24 turnovers. Kansas scored 23 points off the turnovers.

In addition to applying intense pressure on and off the ball, Kansas also enjoyed a size advantage that the Cats' speed was unable to neutralize, Patterson said.

"Your dribble penetration has to be quicker to blow by that bigger defender," she said.

Unfortunately for K-State, its guards appeared to be a step slow against the Jayhawks.

The speed difference was not a mirage, Patterson said, but she said the Cats still could have overcome the agility margin.

"KU is that much quicker probably when we step on the floor," Patterson said. "But a lot of that is due to being hesitant, not having that great confidence when you're really being bodied up."

"KU is faster, quicker, bigger, stronger, and they exploit your weaknesses and maximize their strengths."

Although it's easy to attribute the loss to the Jayhawks' defense, the Cats should look no further than themselves when assigning blame, senior forward Nicky Ramage said.

"There were stretches in the first half when we just couldn't shoot the ball, because we kept throwing the ball away," Ramage said. "We had 14 turnovers in the first half. We can't do that against a good ball team."

continuity, and that is a positive.

Another plus is that Asbury did a decent job of coaching against Missouri. It could be argued that he got Dix to fill in and score a career high 22 points. It also could be argued that he should have had more opportunities to play earlier.

Let's face it — every game this season could be looked at from a positive or negative perspective. It all depends on how you look at it, but try to stay positive.

Turnout, weather not obstacle to night of sports for area youth

By MIKE SHEPHERD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Quality, not quantity.

Andy Harvey, senior in architectural engineering, was pretty sure more children attended this year's Sports Spectacular than last, but conceded that might not have happened.

"We're trying to get more kids here, but I don't know if that's happening," Harvey said. "We've got more people in the pool, though, and they're having a good time."

Swimming was only one event offered to junior high and high school students at the Spectacular on Feb. 19. There was also bowling, billiards, volleyball, tennis and Chris Meldon's favorite sport, basketball.

Meldon, who was with a group from Wakefield's United Methodist Church, elected to continue playing basketball when his two teammates decided to go swimming after a timeout in a three-on-three match they were playing in.

Meldon said the group tries to get together every weekend.

The night of games was sponsored by Alpha Phi Omega, K-State's coed fraternity dedicated to service, leadership and friendship, said Bob Hedley, one of Alpha Phi Omega's advisers.

Though directed at the community, many attendees said the service seemed to have a positive effect on Alpha Phi Omega members.

Heidi Emig, fifth-year senior in accounting, said her two years in Alpha Phi Omega have given her necessary leadership skills.

"In the real world, you're going to have to work in large groups, and someone is going to have to take charge," she said.

Bad weather contributed to last year's low turnout, but this year, Hedley said the group expected 75 children.

They lowered the registration price and moved the starting time up in order to attract more teens. Even though the turnout was low again, that did not keep Alpha Phi Omega's morale down.

"Just seeing the looks on the faces of the kids who are here — kids just goofing off and doing belly flops off the diving board — is very rewarding," Troy Leewright, Alpha Phi Omega alumni member, said.

K-State's chapter of Alpha Phi Omega is the 13th oldest of all universities in the country and has about 50 members, Hedley said.

Hedley said the Spectacular was created as a response to a community request.

"Community groups have said that kids wanted activities that were for high school and junior high kids that were fun and interesting," Hedley said. "A lot of them said there's nothing to do in this town."

"There is a lot to do. You just have to find it."

Chris Meldon (right) reaches out to stop his friend, Luke Visser, from driving around him in a scrimmage Saturday night in Ahearn Field House. The two 14-year-olds came to K-State from Wakefield, Kan., with their church youth group for the Sports Spectacular, sponsored by Alpha Phi Omega.

'American Beauty' intellectual, complicated

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Before I went to see "American Beauty," I jumped online to do a little research on the film. As always, I went to the Internet Movie Database, us.imdb.com, which has a tremendous amount of information on every movie. IMDB also has a voting area, where members can rank movies, which in turn is accumulated into a list of the top 250 films ever made.

So, I must admit I was a bit taken aback when I noticed that "American Beauty" was No. 2 in all-time voting — only behind "The Godfather."

After seeing "American Beauty," I can say with utmost confidence that although it is a good movie, it is nowhere near the second-best movie of all time.

The movie stars Kevin Spacey as Lester, a husband and father in an apparently typical suburban home. The more the movie progresses, however, the more the viewer learns just how atypical this family — as well as suburban living — actually is. Spacey is joined by a terrific cast, including Thora Birch as his moody daughter, Chris Cooper as his militaristic neighbor, and a spectacular Annette Bening as his success-oriented wife.

The movie has some of the darkest character development next to "The Talented Mr. Ripley." However, this movie might be even more disturbing because the characters are so real and plausible and the setting hits too close to home.

The intriguing characters also are helped by a storyline that is extremely intelligent in design. Instead of severe or disjointed plot twists, the story sets a scene and then makes subtle adjustments until each character has undergone remarkable change. This movie truly is an accomplishment in filmmaking because of its uniqueness and ingenuity.

However, those who are dissatisfied with this movie have every reason to be so. If there is such a thing as being too intelligent, this movie probably fits the bill. It is overloaded with imagery and symbolism to the point it puts the viewer at a disadvantage. Sometimes the use is so vague and complicated that the viewer gets hung up on a point that could inhibit the enjoyment of watching the movie. It's as if writer Alan Ball wants to put into the screenplay dozens of literary devices, which all look good on paper but lose their luster on screen.

There is an important lesson for directors to learn from this movie. No matter how brilliant a script is, it still must take into account the audience's ability to keep up with the content. Text has the luxury to be as deep and complicated as it wants, simply because a reader can go back to a certain passage or reread confusing lines. The truth is, the real test of a movie not only is how it affects the viewer but also how it engages the viewer.

"American Beauty" undoubtedly will receive Oscar after Oscar for its contributions to filmmaking. It's just unfortunate that in pushing the envelope, the movie will inspire other movies to become even more vague and incomprehensible.

'Angela's Ashes' doesn't live up to McCourt's memoir

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The movie version of Frank McCourt's Pulitzer Prize-winning story "Angela's Ashes" has the right mood — the sense of poverty, hopelessness and despair.

Instead of capitalizing on a tremendous tale of rising from destitution, the movie just sits on that mood and doesn't budge. In fact, the movie offers little in terms of emotion, character development or even plot. It just shows the viewer how terrible life was growing up an Irish Catholic in the 1930s.

Throughout the film, there's a sense the movie is holding back. Part of this can be attributed to the modesty that laced the memoir — McCourt even says many children grow up miserable, and his story is simply a telling of one such childhood. The movie could be seen as a reflection of that modesty in that it doesn't try to make too big of a deal out of the story.

But this movie could use some dressing up. Even the most emotional scenes in the movie are devoid of any real feeling. Part of this is subpar acting, especially on the part of child actors playing McCourt. Three actors play McCourt as he grows from ages 5 to 16. Only the oldest, Michael Legge, is able to show much depth in the character.

Emily Watson also is disappointing as McCourt's mother, Angela. Although she obviously is able to portray a sad mother, the performance lacks any novel acting techniques that truly move the viewer.

Perhaps the best acting in the movie comes from the most emotionless character, McCourt's father, Robert Carlyle. He is able to make the viewer believe how fond McCourt is of his father despite some despicable actions. Carlyle brings to the character a brilliant blend of callousness and charisma — enough to thoroughly disable the viewer's ability to pass judgment on him.

It's amazing to think just what a more moving score would have done to this movie. If viewers watch a depressing scene and can't understand why they are not moved to tears, chances are it's because there is either trite music or no music setting the tone for the scene. Such a crucial oversight on the part of director Alan Parker might have been the difference between a daub portrait of McCourt's childhood and a great telling of a compelling story.

By not recommending this movie, I am in no way making a slight against McCourt's memoir. Just the opposite: The movie doesn't do the author's work sufficient justice.

Tracy Chapman's newest release retains mellow style

By REED DUNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Tracy Chapman is a great storyteller.

Her new album, "Telling Stories," is the follow-up to her 1995 release of "New Beginning" and brings fans 11 new stories. Chapman wrote all the songs on this album.

Mellow sounds from her previous four albums are carried into her most recent release. The title track opens the compact disc, explaining the truth music review

Tracy Chapman
"Telling Stories"

behind the stories she tells through her lyrics.

Chapman, a four-time Grammy Award winner, follows the song with stories of life, religion, conflict and compassion. "Paper and Ink," one of the many brilliant stories told on the album, brings conflict and compassion together with a song about the financial struggles occurring within a relationship.

The style of music is nothing new to Chapman's longtime fans. All tracks on the album have Chapman's voice accompanied by soft, backup instrumentation.

The only addition to the music is background vocals from Emmylou Harris in "The Only One." The song's lyrics provide a compelling story of coping with the death of a loved one.

Even though the music is par for the course, the songs are definitely some of Chapman's best work. Having won a Grammy for "Give Me One Reason," Chapman should be included in the list of nominees for music awards in the upcoming year.

Every song on the album tells a great story and is worthy of recognition. The musical stories offer different themes on life and are ideas that people from all walks of life can appreciate and comprehend.

Bush wins pivotal South Carolina primary; McCain vows to fight on

By RON FOURNIER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLUMBIA, S.C. — George W. Bush rallied Republican conservatives Saturday to defeat Sen. John McCain in South Carolina's GOP primary, snatching momentum from his insurgent rival as the race heads into an 18-state sprint during 17 days. McCain was pugnacious, declaring to supporters, "We have just begun to fight."

"I'm relieved," said Bush, who was defeated in a landslide in New Hampshire's leadoff primary nearly three weeks ago. "Relieved is not the right word. I'm excited and energized."

Forced to regroup, McCain both congratulated Bush for his victory and criticized the negativity of the governor's campaign. "I cannot wait for the next round," he said, saying he would offer "a choice between a record of reform and an empty slogan of reform."

With 97 percent of the vote counted, Bush had 291,848 votes, or 53 percent, to McCain's 229,202 or 42 percent. Alan Keyes was a distant third at 24,281, or 5 percent. The dramatic campaign pushed primary turnout to a resounding record, but it did not help McCain as he had hoped.

"The pundits were saying a big turnout would be harmful to my candidacy," Bush said, "when in fact this campaign ignited and united the Republican base."

Bush needed to win here to stall McCain's surge and, indeed, for months his campaign had seen South Carolina as a tradition-minded "firewall state" that could blunt any damage from the chares of New Hampshire. The Texas governor had a huge lead in early polling but McCain closed the gap in the past 10 days — only to see Bush mount a $4 million campaign with help from interest groups and surrogates who questioned McCain's conservative credentials.

Interviews conducted by Voter News Service indicated that Bush won by a lopsided margin among bedrock conservatives and regular Republicans. Six out of 10 voters in the primary were Republican, and Bush won two-thirds of them.

Iranian reformists set to break hard-line monopoly

By AFSHIN VALINEJAD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TEHRAN, Iran — A former intelligence minister whose agents were accused of killing political enemies was among leading hard-liners defeated Sunday as it became increasingly clear that Iranians want a reform-minded parliament.

If the returns from Friday's election continue to favor the reformists, as is likely, it will be the first time the parliament has been free of hard-line domination since the 1979 Islamic revolution brought the clergy to power.

Results had been announced Sunday for 190 of the 290 seats in the Majlis, or parliament. Winners are listed only by name, not affiliation, but a background check of the candidates by The Associated Press showed the winners included 137 reformists — or 72 percent.

Conservatives had taken 44 seats, or 23 percent, and independents had nine seats, or 5 percent. The Interior Ministry, in charge of the elections, will announce the final results when they become known later this week.

Meanwhile, four provincial cities were reported calm after election-related violence Saturday left two dead.

In Isfahan, Iran's second-largest city, reformists won all five seats. A big-name hard-liner who lost there was former Intelligence Minister Ali Fallahian.

Reformists have said that Fallahian should be questioned officially about rogue Intelligence Ministry agents who murdered five dissidents in 1998. In 1997, a German court issued a warrant for Fallahian, saying Iran's highest rulers ordered the 1992 assassination of an Iranian-Kurdish opposition figure in Berlin.

A reformist wave has been sweeping Iran since the May 1997 election of President Mohammad Khatami. The 56-year-old president, a moderate Shiite cleric, has captured the hearts of the young with his efforts to widen individual freedoms, free the press and reduce the clergy's interference in the government, the judiciary and people's lives.

But Khatami's initiatives had been stymied by hard-liners who controlled the outgoing Majlis.

With the new parliament convening in June, what remains to be seen is whether the hard-liners will continue to use their key powers to block the reformists. The Guardian Council, 12 clerics and lawyers, must approve all bills passed by Parliament. Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, has the final word. He leads the armed forces, judiciary and state-run radio and television.

had a flat tire. A man returning home from his job saw the vehicle, questioned the boys and flagged down a Morris County deputy sheriff.

The man, Topeka disc jockey Ray Turner, said one of the bloodied boys was "frantic, panic-stricken." He said he saw Brown sitting in the front passenger seat with a head wound.

There were bullet holes in the windshield and in the back quarter panel of the car.

Turner said one of the boys told him they had been shot at as they drove away at speeds approaching 100 mph.

Cordray was arrested at his workplace in Emporia by Lyon County Sheriff Cliff Hacker and

"Our community has gone through a great deal."

Jim Wagner, Brian Wagner's father, said the entire ordeal has been difficult for all families involved.

"I couldn't help having a tear in my eye knowing what those parents are going through."

"But at least they know someday their child will walk through that door again," he said.

KBI Special Agent Bill Halvorsen.

Cordray lives near the site of a former nuclear missile silo that has been deactivated by the government but remains a curiosity for young people in the area.

The three boys were at the entrance of the property the suspect lives, Hacker said. Cordray was on his property.

The boys apparently had been in some sort of confrontation with Cordray, left the area and then returned, Hacker said.

The shootings occurred when they returned.

Turner said one of the boys told him they had been "nosing around" at the missile site.

Brown was a starter for the varsity basketball team, a member of the cross country team and an honor roll student.

Avalanche in New England results in 1 fatality

By J.M. HIRSCH
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CONCORD, N.H. — An avalanche on New England's highest peak smothered a skier Sunday, one day after a different avalanche killed a skier in upstate New York.

David McPhedran and Aimee Reiter, both of Kents Hill, Maine, were skiing in an area of Mount Washington called the Gulf of Slides when the avalanche hit about 1 p.m. Only Reiter survived, said Col. Ron Alie of the New Hampshire Fish and Game Department.

"They decided to climb up one of the gullies to ski down it and caused the avalanche, which swept them down the gully," Alie said. "She was buried waist-deep, but David was buried face down."

Reiter climbed out and uncovered McPhedran, 42, but was unable to save him, Alie said.

With heavy snowfall and rough weather conditions, Mount Washington is one of the few places in the East where avalanches are a danger. During the last century, 126 people have died there.

Anna Porter, a weather observer at the Mount Washington Observatory, said wind gusts reached 64 mph at the summit Sunday afternoon. Visibility was one-sixteenth of a mile with blowing snow and freezing fog, she said.

The 6,288-foot mountain is known as home to some of the world's worst weather and was the site of the highest wind speed ever recorded — 231 mph on April 12, 1934.

A recorded message at the Appalachian Mountain Club Sunday morning warned that the avalanche danger for the mountain's Tuckerman and Huntington ravines was high.

The club said the danger is due in part to more than a foot of snow that fell Friday night and Saturday and to the high winds.

On Saturday, a rare avalanche in northern New York's Adirondacks killed Toma Jacob Vracarich, 27, of Lake Placid, N.Y., and injured five other skiers. The avalanche occurred off-trail on the northeast side of Wright Peak, on the outskirts of Lake Placid.

One skier in the group described seeing fracture lines opening in the snow and then hearing a rumble as the skiers were swept down the slope.

"It was like being strained through the woods, just like a little pinball being pushed through the woods by a 100-mph force," Rohan Roy of Chateaugay, N.Y., said.

Officials in Vermont posted avalanche warnings last week at Smugglers' Notch, popular among skiers, and on Vermont 108, a state highway.

"In my 13 years, I have never seen anything like this. There are fracture lines all over the place," said Sgt. Butch Patch of the Vermont Army National Guard.

for him."

Sir Tuck is an Irish setter who was brought into the Botbyl's residence for companionship, something Saddler said she stresses.

"We need the handlers and dogs to have a good relationship," she said. "They need to have daily contact for good interaction."

Saddler, who owns three dogs, has been the program's trainer for two years, but her experience goes back to her high school years.

"We had cats growing up," she said. "So I used to borrow the neighbor's dogs in the afternoon to train them."

Although she said she enjoys working with dogs, her biggest challenge is working with unhappy ones. She said it's hard because owners do not realize their dogs are the way they are because of how they have treated them.

"They blame their dog for their own actions," she said.

That's why Saddler said she stresses the fun and the positive in these agility events, because it exercises the dog's brain and body and makes them good family pets.

They are doing some very healthy things for that animal, she said.

"We're actually saving a lot of lives here today," Saddler said. "Without something like this, dogs become destructive and then eventually the owners take them to a pound."

Spring enrollment up from 1999

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is experiencing its second largest enrollment figure in history, with the spring semester's headcount at 19,494.

The Kansas Board of Regents released K-State's headcount for the spring semester last week, which shows a 2.6 percent increase from the Manhattan campus' spring enrollment figure of 17,827 last year.

The total headcount, which is calculated in each of the regents' six public universities on the 20th day of class, includes the College of Veterinary Medicine center and the Manhattan and Salina campuses.

Of all state universities, K-State's enrollment experienced the greatest increase.

Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance, said the increase in enrollment would not have a negative effect on students in need of money.

"We've been fortunate here at K-State that our financial aid figures tend to increase," Moeder said.

As enrollment increases, so do the amount of funds allocated to the university for financial aid.

He said the increase in the amount of aid available could actually help, not hinder, students' chances for aid.

"Increasing enrollment can help students get money," Moeder said. "So, the increase is a good thing."

Don Foster, university registrar, said the enrollment was attributed to the increase in the fall enrollment figure.

"The fall semester really drives the whole year. Any increase in the fall carries over to the spring," Foster said.

Though the increase affected class size and the number of sections offered, he said it is easier to accommodate to a spring increase rather than a fall one.

"Hiring teachers and creating class sections is really much harder in the fall," Foster said.

While spring enrollment is up from a year ago, it is a decrease from the fall headcount. He said the decrease was attributed to one main factor.

"It's primarily due to December graduation," Foster said. "Nearly 1,000 students graduate in December."

He said other reasons for the decrease are attributed to drop-out students; the dismissal policy, which states new students who obtain a 1.0 grade point average or lower will be automatically dismissed; and to the fact that fall is the natural cycle for students to start school.

Foster said the enrollment figure was not unexpected because of the fall headcount and predicts a continued increase because of a rise in high school graduates.

"I really expect we will have another year or two years of increase," Foster said.

Student killed in car crash

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An aviation student at K-State-Salina died Friday night in a one-car crash west of Salina, authorities said.

Bryan Bright, junior in airway science, sideswiped a guardrail on a bridge while traveling east-bound on State Street. The car tumbled end-over-end down the east embankment of a nearby creek at about 11:45 p.m. The car came to rest on its top.

According to the police report, the vehicle was airborne after the collision with the guardrail.

The guardrail struck the center of the radiator and sheared off the driver's seat. The driver-side door was torn open.

Bright was thrown nearly 50 feet from the vehicle and was found dead at the scene about 15 minutes later. No seat belt apparently was used.

Roger Steinbrock, Salina public and alumni relations coordinator, said he knew Bright well.

"He was a young man that always had a smile on his face," Steinbrock said. "He loved life. He made people happy. He could always liven up conversation."

While studying to be a pilot at K-State-Salina, Bright worked night shifts at the university library. Karlene Propst, library assistant, worked with Bright.

While at work, Bright would flip through aviation magazines and point out to those around him which planes he wanted, Propst said. Bright was eager to speak his mind and did what needed to be done, she said.

It's always difficult to see people graduate and leave, she said. But this was a harder situation to deal with.

"He wasn't afraid to share his life with you," Propst said. "It's difficult to think he's gone."

After capturing top honors during a conference in Chicago over the weekend, K-State's Interfraternity Council won the Jellison Award for having the best council in its 16-state region at the annual Mid-American Greek Council Association Conference, Mike Goodpasture, IFC president and senior in physical science, said.

"I didn't realize how much it meant to me until I was eating my dinner and felt nauseous," Goodpasture said. "I felt a lot of relief once we won. I smiled for the first time in hours. It was relieving that the council was recognized for all their hard work. They deserved to win."

Panhellenic Council was runner-up to the University of Kansas for the Sutherland Award, which is also the highest honor within the association.

The award system is based on points and divisions, McClellan said. The councils are in four divisions.

The more houses on a campus, the higher the division they compete in, Goodpasture said. Panhellenic Council competed in the third division, and the IFC competed in the fourth division.

There are eight awards that the councils compete for: council management, leadership and educational development, academic achievement, risk reduction and management, community service, public relations, self-governance and judicial affairs and membership recruitment.

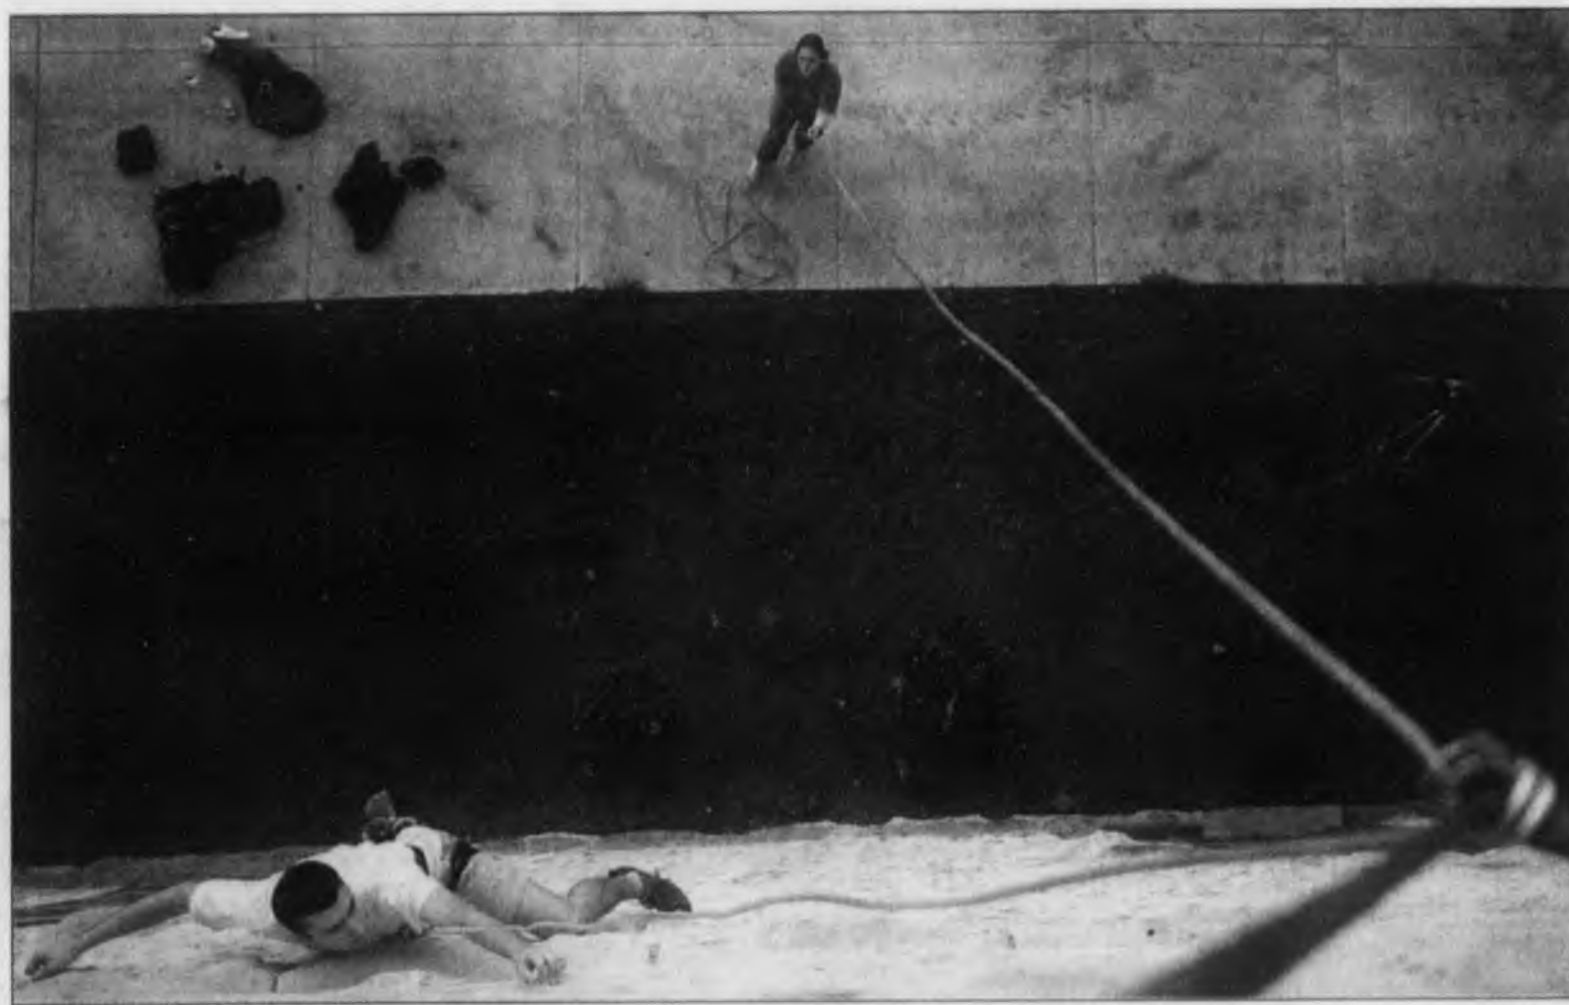

Both Panhellenic and IFC won all eight awards.

The judges rate each council based on certain criteria and then give the awards on an individual basis for each university's programs. The awards are based on documentation through the greek system, McClellan said.

Web site maneuvering to post lecture notes

By ANGELA KISTNER

Versity.com, online access to lecture notes, is offering incentives to K-State instructors to acquire permission to display the instructors' notes on its site.

K-State course lecture notes are not accessible on Varsity.com after many instructors alleged that Varsity.com and similar sites were violating copyright infringement laws.

Provost James Coffman said K-State and Varsity.com have made an agreement that faculty members own intellectual property represented by their notes.

Varsity.com also has agreed that K-State students must have instructors' permission to put their class notes on the site.

Beau Blackford, former campus operations manager for Varsity.com, said one incentive Varsity.com is offering instructors to gain their permission is free use of software owned by the site.

Arana Michie, professor of political science who disavows companies like Varsity.com, said Varsity.com offered her 100 shares of its stock if she would give the company permission to display her notes.

"To me, that's unethical for me as a professor," she said. "I'm already paid to teach my class. It's not like

UPC taking applications for new leaders

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Becoming a leader in campus activities can be as easy as making a trip to the third floor of the K-State Student Union, home of Union Program Council.

The organization, formed more than 40 years ago in order to provide campus-based entertainment for K-State students, is looking to fill its 11 executive positions, said Tim Yeaglin, current UPC president and senior in management.

Jobs including president, vice president and UPC's nine committee chairs are up for grabs until March 1, the due date for all position applications.

Heide McBride, UPC program adviser, said involvement in the group is beneficial for students looking to polish their leadership skills.

"I think developing skills like time management and delegation is a great advantage to UPC," McBride said.

Yeaglin said his involvement helped him develop his managerial skills.

As president, Yeaglin said he basically runs meetings of the executive council, consisting of all 11 UPC executives, and he also attends meetings of the Union Governing Board to keep board members aware of UPC events.

"I also help advisers with leadership topics and their goals for the year and make sure the chairs are keeping on track with those goals," he said.

Yeaglin said his day at the UPC office is spent dealing with the different sections of the organization and their relationships with other campus groups.

"I pretty much act as a student adviser to all the committees," he said. "I have a position on the Union Governing Board liaison to other campus organizations, and I oversee overall programming."

The position is also important when providing information for other campus groups that wish to get involved with Union activities through co-sponsorships, such as speeches during Black History Month, Yeaglin said.

While the job of president focuses on issues outside of UPC, the vice president's position deals more with committee chairpersons and their problems within the UPC office, McBride said.

"The vice president's main focus would be membership recruitment and retention. Membership is a big issue," she said. "Helping chairs run meetings is also a part of the job."

McBride said the nine chairperson spots open were for UPC Arts, Eclectic Entertainment, Feature Films, Issues and Ideas, Kaleidoscope Films, Multicultural, Outdoor Adventures, Promotions and Special Events committees.

"You don't necessarily need UPC experience to become a committee chair," she said. "We're looking for people willing to do the job and interested in developing their own leadership skills."

Chairpersons are responsible for organizing activities their committees suggest after calendar and budget checks, McBride said.

"The chairs would mainly be working on everything that goes into a program as far as contacting agents and selecting events for the following semester," she said. "They would help run their committee meetings and delegate tasks and make sure they were there the night of the event."

Gonzalez case postponed for selection of new judge

MIAMI — A new judge will be assigned to the Elian Gonzalez case after the previous one was hospitalized with stroke-like symptoms. The critical hearing Tuesday on whether the court has jurisdiction in the boy's case has been postponed.

U.S. District Judge William M. Hoeveler, 77, was taken to the hospital by ambulance with slurred speech Sunday, unable to move his right leg and arm, said Dr. James Stewart, a neurologist at HealthSouth Doctors' Hospital of Coral Gables.

Stewart said the symptoms appeared to be the beginning of a stroke. A stroke is when those symptoms last for 24 hours, he said.

Elian is at the center of a custody battle involving his relatives in Miami and his father in Cuba. The Immigration and Naturalization Service has ordered the 6-year-old boy returned to his father.

Hoeveler had planned to hear arguments Tuesday on whether the federal court can intervene in the case. Chief U.S. District Judge Edward B. Davis said Monday said he will preside over the hearing, but only for the purpose of informing lawyers in the case about the assignment of a new judge and to schedule future hearings.

Davis said the new judge will be selected randomly by a computer.

Last week, Hoeveler had complained of heart racing, his wife, Griffin Hoeveler, told The Miami Herald. A doctor had suggested he go to the hospital for tests, but Hoeveler declined.

Hoeveler, a veteran federal judge who presided over the trial of former Panamanian dictator Manuel Noriega, was assigned the Elian case after another judge withdrew last month because of a possible conflict of interest.

Davis said that on Monday he was told by a doctor that Hoeveler was doing much better.

KC fire kills 6-year-old boy, hospitalizes 3 early Sunday

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Fire early Sunday killed a 6-year-old boy whose mother, brother and sister were injured in the blaze.

Irvin Josenberger III was pronounced dead at the scene after being found face down on a bed in a heavily damaged bedroom.

His mother, Maria Frazier, 26, his sister, Fatima Josenberger, 3, and his brother Jerrell Josenberger, 4, were out of the house when firefighters arrived at 3:35 a.m.

Fatima Josenberger had severe burns on an arm and was in fair condition at the University of Kansas Medical Center. Her mother and brother were treated there for smoke inhalation and released.

There was no telephone in the house. When the fire was discovered, the father, Irvin Josenberger Jr., ran to nearby houses, knocking on doors and shouting for help.

Kansas City, Kan., Fire Department spokesmen said the fire started on the second floor and was contained there. The cause of the fire, which caused an estimated $20,000 in damage, had not been determined.

2 men in serious condition following robbery attempt

COMMERCE CITY, Colo. — Two of three would-be robbers were hospitalized in serious condition after a homeowner shot them, police said.

Two men and a woman entered an Adams County home Saturday night, apparently intending to rob an acquaintance, said Adams County sheriff's Sgt. Craig Coleman.

The 39-year-old homeowner got his semi-automatic handgun and fired when one of the men pulled a knife.

Coleman said the three intruders ran from the house, jumped in a car and went to a relative's home, where they called an ambulance.

The two men were in serious condition Sunday night at Denver Health Medical Center.

The suspects, whose names weren't released, likely will be charged with aggravated robbery.

"As soon as they get out of the hospital, we'll be there to meet and greet them," Coleman said.

Their alleged partner in the scheme, Elizabeth Staley, 19, of unincorporated Jefferson County, was not hurt and was charged with suspicion of aggravated robbery, Coleman said.

Class size, tuition serve as platform for Teach, Burkin candidacy

Jared Teach, junior in public relations, and Stan Burkin, junior in human resource management and marketing, announce their presidential candidacy Monday afternoon between Holtz and Eisenhower halls.

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jared Teach and Stan Burkin announced their presidential campaign by the clock in the quad between Eisenhower and Holtz halls on Monday afternoon.

Their campaign, "Quality People for a Quality Goal," focuses on more than one issue. Each issue revolves around the duo's goal of serving student interests.

Presidential candidate Teach, junior in public relations, and vice presidential candidate Burkin, junior in human resource management and marketing, plan to target education.

They said improving the conditions of overcrowded lecture classes and adding lab classes would ease the overwhelming stress put on students.

"When lecture classes come with labs, students have done better overall than in those classes, which have not been broken up," Teach said.

Along with educational concerns, Teach and Burkin's other main focus is to level off the price of the continuing increase in tuition, they said.

"Tuition has increased more than $1,000 over the past few years, and we see this as a significant issue," Teach said.

"Many students keep enrolling here, but there are also many others who are leaving because they can no longer afford the cost."

The pair said they think education should be made more affordable so enrollment rates can continue to grow steadily.

"It's somewhat ridiculous how fast and how much the tuition rate has increased," he said.

Concerned with students' safety on campus, they said they believe certain areas of campus lighting can be improved.

"The lighting here on campus is fine, but what about near crosswalks or the emergency blue lights?" Burkin said. "Those are the lights we are targeting."

The pair also wants to make others more aware that lighting is a relevant issue. It is something they said they hope to fix if elected.

"How many blue lights have you seen?" Teach said.

Improving the benefits of KATS by adding more useful services to the system is another goal for Teach and Burkin.

"It can save some trouble for students if they are able to schedule appointments through Lafene over KATS," Burkin said.

They also support a shuttle system; however, they said education continues to be their main platform.

"Difficult classes, such as Principle of Finance, could use the addition of a lab so students can perhaps have that extra one-on-one attention," Teach said.

Brooks, Miller campaign issues focus on financial aid, fall break

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chris Brooks, junior in business administration, and Andrew Miller, senior in mechanical engineering, have never run on a student body presidential campaign, but that doesn't keep the presidential hopefuls from lobbying for issues in which they believe.

The candidates kicked off their campaign for student body president and vice president on Monday night, running under the slogan "We've Got Issues."

Brooks and Miller, who decided to run after last year's political race, said they aren't running for political reasons; they just want to represent the university.

"We want to represent K-State in a way that looks good to the Legislature, the Board of Regents and the state of Kansas," Brooks said. "And we do have issues."

Although vice presidential candidate Miller has never run for political office, his running mate, Brooks, is no stranger to the campaign process. Brooks won the Business Student Council representative race last year and served on the council's financial committee.

The pair's platform focuses on two main issues: financial aid and fall break.

Brooks said students he talked to are willing to start school earlier in order to have a mid-semester relaxing period.

"We know it's been an issue in the past," Miller said. "But, we've heard a lot of people talking about it, and we want to bring it back. We really think that it's very plausible."

"We believe the break is well deserved for faculty and students," Miller said.

The majority of the candidates' financial support comes from off-campus organizations, including Budweiser.

"Most of our support comes from off-campus because of campaign regulations," he said. "We have plenty of student supporters, though, so we don't feel the need to spend a lot."

"I'm really struggling to pay for my tuition, and I know many others are worse off than I am," Brooks said. "I work two jobs, and that barely gets me by."

The candidates also said they believe students should get Monday and Tuesday off during Thanksgiving break to allow for a nine-day vacation instead of five-day break.
